

266

B87W

Brown
Why and how of foreign missions

Acc. No. 178886

KEEP YOUR CARD IN THIS POCKET

Books will be issued only on presentation of proper library cards.

Unless labeled otherwise, books may be retained for two weeks, subject to renewal for a like period. Borrowers finding book marked, defaced or mutilated are expected to report same at library desk; otherwise the last borrower will be held responsible for all imperfections discovered.

The card holder is responsible for all books drawn on this card.

No books issued unless fines are paid.

Lost cards and change of residence must be reported promptly.

PUBLIC LIBRARY,
KANSAS CITY, MO.

KEEP YOUR CARD IN THIS POCKET

BERKOWITZ ENVELOPE COMPANY
KANSAS CITY, MO.

KANSAS CITY MO PUBLIC LIBRARY

0 0001 230299 #

CHURCH

WHY AND HOW OF FOREIGN MISSIONS

BY

ARTHUR JUDSON BROWN

New York

DOMESTIC AND FOREIGN MISSIONARY SOCIETY OF
THE PROTESTANT EPISCOPAL CHURCH IN THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA

Copyright, 1911, by Young People's Missionary Movement of the United States and Canada

TO THE FRIENDS IN THE HOME
CHURCHES WHO HAVE LOYALLY
SUSTAINED THE CAUSE OF FOREIGN MISSIONS, NOT ONLY BY THEIR GIFTS, BUT BY THEIR SYMPATHY AND PRAYERS

CONTENTS

CHAPTER	PAGE
Preface to the Churchman's Edition.....	ix
Preface .....	xi
I The Foreign Missionary Motive and Aim..	i
II Foreign Missionary Administration.....	29
III Qualifications and Appointment.....	71
IV The Financial Support of the Missionary Enterprise .....	95
V The Missionary at Work.....	123
VI The Native Church.....	151
VII The Missionary Enterprise and its Critics .	187
VIII The Spirit of the Missionary.....	221
IX The Home Church and the Enterprise.....	245

PREFACE TO THE CHURCHMAN'S EDITION

This edition of The Why and How of Foreign Missions is made possible through the courtesy and kind permission of the author, and of the Young People's Missionary Movement. Slight changes in phraseology have been made here and there throughout the book. The chapters on "Foreign Missionary Administration" and "The Native Church" have been largely rewritten in order to present the details of our missionary administration.

Everett P. Smith,

Educational Secretary, Domestic and Foreign Missionary Society.

Church Missions House, New York City.

Epiphany, 1909.

PREFACE

This book has been prepared in compliance with a request of the Young People's Missionary Movement for a succinct statement of those aspects of the modern foreign missionary enterprise which are of special interest to laymen, in a form adapted to the needs of busy people and of mission study classes. It therefore discusses the chief motives that prompt to foreign missionary effort, the objects that are sought, the methods of handling and administering funds, the kind of persons who are appointed to missionary service, the work that they are doing, the difficulties they encounter, the spirit they manifest, and the objections and criticisms which disturb so many people at home. Prominence is given to the large problems which are involved in the magnitude of the foreign missionary enterprise, and in the changing world conditions caused not only by the religious but by the political, commercial, and intellectual movements of our age.

Those who are familiar with the author's larger book, The Foreign Missionary, will note that much of the material of this book has been taken from that volume. The present work, however, is not a condensation of the larger one, nor is it intended to take its place. The idea in this book is simply to take such parts of The Foreign Missionary as may be of special interest to laymen who desire a brief statement of the essential elements of the foreign missionary movement, leaving The Foreign Missionary, not only as a work of reference, but as a preferable volume for student volunteers and missionaries.

I gladly acknowledge valuable assistance from the Editorial Committee of the Young People's Missionary Movement in adapting this book to the use of mission study classes.

Arthur Judson Brown.

New York City,
June 1, 1908.

THE FOREIGN MISSIONARY MOTIVE AND AIM

The goal of history is the redemption of the world. The consummation of all missionary endeavor will be when the knowledge of Jesus Christ has become universal. Hence, the aim of missions is to make Jesus Christ known to every creature, so that he may have an intelligent opportunity to accept him as his Savior.

—J. Ross Stevenson

So, to sum the matter up, the Christian missionary motive is threefold. We are summoned by God in Christ to join with him in doing that work of saving grace toward men which is nearest to his heart, and we cannot refuse: loyalty to God and Christ constrains us. We have received in Christ the best good in life, and are impelled from within to impart it: love to men constrains us. The world needs the gift, and needs it now: and the tremendous want constrains us. The threefold motive is justified by present facts and by eternal realities, and there is nothing that can legitimately deprive it of its force, except the full accomplishment of the end. No special views are needed to enforce the motive. Taking the world exactly as it is and as all sound knowledge finds it, the motive is sufficient. But it is a spiritual motive, and must therefore be spiritually discerned.

—William Newton Clarke

I

THE FOREIGN MISSIONARY MOTIVE AND AIM

RECENT years have seen some change of Change of Emphasis emphasis in the motives which prompt men to engage in the foreign missionary enterprise. Some motives that stirred our fathers are not as strongly operative to-day, but others have emerged that were then but vaguely discerned.

It is now generally recognized that mission work must be prosecuted amid changed conditions. Our constituency has a knowledge of the non-christian world that in the past it did not have. Men in our churches are no longer so ignorant of other peoples. Books and magazine articles have dissipated the mystery of the Orient. Electricity enables the newspapers to tell us every morning what occurred yesterday in Seoul and Peking, in Rangoon and Teheran. Our treatment of the Chinese and the Negro testify to the fact that race prejudice is still strong. Nevertheless, the white man does not look down upon the men of other races as he did a century ago. He recog- A New World-view

4 Why and How of Foreign Missions

nizes more clearly the good qualities which some of the non-christian peoples possess. He hears more of the industry of the Chinese and the intellect of the Hindu. This recognition is not unmingled with fear. No white man of today despises the Japanese, certainly not in Russia; nor can any one view with unconcern the evidences of awakening national life among the teeming myriads of the Orient.

Illusions Dispelled

The transition from the first century of Protestant missions to the second century is attended by no more significant change than this. People at home are no longer under illusions as to what non-christians are, and they, in turn, are no longer under illusions as to what we are. The romance of missions in the popular mind has been largely dispelled. The missionary is no longer a hero to the average Christian, but a man with a message to his fellow man.

Extent of Missionary Obligation

There are, too, certain movements of theological thought which must be considered. Whatever we may think of them, we cannot ignore their prevalence, nor should we argue that they are inconsistent with missionary interest. No man should be allowed to feel that he is exempt from the missionary obligation because he is not influenced by our particular motive, or because he adopts a different interpretation of Bible teaching regarding certain doctrines. We may deplore his interpretation, but we cannot admit that it releases him from the duty of coöperating in this work. Every man who believes in a just and loving personal God and receives the benefits of Christianity, whether he shares our theological convictions or not, should aid in the effort to communicate those benefits to races that have not received them.

Changes in the political and economic life of the world, in the attitude of the Christian nations toward the non-christian, and their attitude in turn toward us, do not impair the primary missionary motive. Rather do they increase it. No changes that have taken place or that can possibly take place can set aside the great central facts that Jesus Christ is the temporal and eternal salvation of men, and that it is the duty of those who know him to tell others about him. There may be questions as to method, but no objection lies against the essential enterprise that does not lie with equal force against the fundamental truths of the Christian religion. Through all the tumult of theological strife, the one figure that is standing out more and more clearly and commandingly before men is the figure of the Son of Man, the Divine and Eternal Son of the Ever-Living God. In him is the true unity of the race and around him cluster its noblest activi-

Missionary Motive Centers in Christ

6 Why and How of Foreign Missions

ties. No matter how much Christians may differ as to other things, they will be more and more agreed as to the imperative duty and the inspiring privilege of preaching Jesus Christ to the whole world.

Primary and Secondary
Motives

Foreign missionary motives may be divided into two main classes, primary and secondary, though this classification is arbitrary and though there may be difference of opinion as to the class to which certain motives properly belong. The primary motives, as we conceive them, are three.

A Genuine
Christian Experience

1. The Soul's Experience in Christ. In proportion as this is genuine and deep, will we desire to communicate it to others. Propagation is a law of the spiritual life. The genius of Christianity is expansive. Ruskin reminds us of Southey's statement that no man was ever yet convinced of any momentous truth without feeling in himself the power as well as the desire of communicating it. That was an exquisite touch of regenerated nature, and one beautifully illustrative of the promptings of a normal Christian experience, which led Andrew, after he rose from Jesus' feet, to find first his own brother, Simon, and say unto him: "We have found the Messiah. . . . He brought him unto Jesus." No external authority, however commanding, can take the place of this internal motive.

People who say that they do not believe in foreign missions are usually quite unconscious of the indictment which they bring against their own spiritual experience. The man who has no religion of his own that he values of course is not interested in the effort to make it known to others. One may be simply ignorant of the content of his faith or the real character of the missionary movement, but as a rule those who know the real meaning of the Christian experience are conscious of an overmastering impulse to communicate it to others.

Eagerness to Communicate

2. The World's Need of Christ. He who has knowledge that is essential to his fellow men is under obligation to convey that knowledge to them. It makes no difference who those men are, or where they live, or whether they are conscious of their need, or how much inconvenience or expense he may incur in reaching them. The fact that he can help them is reason why he should help them. This is an essential part of the foreign missionary impulse. ¶ We have the revelation of God which is potential of a civilization that benefits man, an education that fits him for higher usefulness, a scientific knowledge that enlarges his powers, a medical skill that alleviates his sufferings, and above all a relation to Jesus Christ that not only lends new dignity to this earthly life but that saves his soul and prepares him

A Needy
World

8 Why and How of Foreign Missions

for eternal companionship with God. "In none other is there salvation." Therefore, we must convey this gospel to the world. There is no worthy reason for being concerned about the salvation of the man next to us which is not equally applicable to the man five thousand miles away.

Breadth of Soul Required

"It is hard to realize this concerning those who are so distant?" Precisely; foreign missionary interest presupposes breadth of soul. Any one can love his own family, but it takes a high-souled man to love all men. He who has that which the world needs is debtor to the world. The true disciple would feel this even if Christ had spoken no command. The missionary impulse would have stirred him to spontaneous action. Christ simply voiced the highest and holiest dictates of the human heart when he summoned his followers to missionary activity. The question whether the heathen really need Christ may be answered by the counter-question: Do we need him? and the intensity of our desire to tell them of Christ will be in proportion to the intensity of our own sense of need.

Salvation Still the Aim

We do not hear as much as our fathers heard of the motive of salvation of the heathen. Our age prefers to dwell upon the blessings of faith rather than upon the consequences of unbelief. And yet if we believe that Christ is our “life,” it is impossible to avoid the conclusion that to be without Christ is death. Reason as well as revelation tells us that man has sinned, that “the wages of sin is death,” and that this truth is as applicable to Asia and Africa as to Europe and America. We grant that it is possible that some who have never heard of Christ may be saved. The Spirit of God is not shut up to the methods that have been revealed to us. He works when and where and how he pleases. In ways unknown to us, he may apply the benefits of redemption to those who, without opportunity to accept the historic Christ, may live up to the light they have. Missionaries tell us that they seldom find such cases; but, we should not dogmatize regarding every individual of the millions who have never been approached.

Taking non-christian peoples as we know them, however, it is sorrowfully, irrefutably true that they are living in known sin, and that by no possible stretch of charity can they be considered beyond the necessity for the revealed gospel. Various statements and figures are used in the New Testament to express the condition of those who know not Christ, but whether they are interpreted literally or figuratively, their fundamental meaning is plain. Jesus came “to save,” and salvation is from something. A charitable hope that some are

State of Non-christian People

living like the pious Hebrews before the incarnation does not lessen our duty to give them the clearer knowledge, which, like Simeon of old, they would eagerly welcome, nor does it modify in the least our obligation toward the masses who are living on a lower level. The Light shines for all, and those who see it must spread the tidings; for every man, however degraded, is “Heir of the same inheritance,

Child of the self-same God.
He hath but stumbled in the path
We have in weakness trod.”<sup>1</sup>

Christ's Command

3. The Command of Christ. The circumstances were inexpressibly solemn. He had risen from the dead and was about to ascend to the Father. But ere he left his disciples, he said unto them: “All authority hath been given unto me in heaven and on earth. Go ye therefore, and make disciples of all the nations, baptizing them into the name of the Father and of the Son and the Holy Spirit: teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I commanded you: and lo, I am with you always, even unto the end of the world.”<sup>1</sup> A little later, he reiterated the charge: “Ye shall be my witnesses both in Jerusalem, and in all Judea and Samaria, and unto the utter-

<sup>1</sup> Matt. xxviii. 18-20.

most part of the earth."<sup>1</sup> "And he lifted up his hands and blessed them"<sup>2</sup> "And a cloud received him out of their sight."<sup>3</sup>

There is no gainsaying that command. Whether we consider the Person who gave it, the circumstances in which it was given, or the duty imposed, we must regard it as the weightiest of utterances. If it were the only motive, foreign missionary work would be a mechanical performance of duty, the missionary merely an obedient soldier; but taken in connection with the preceding motives, it adds the impressive sanctions of divine authority. It is the bugle call which, to the true soldier, never loses its thrilling, response-compelling power. It is not a request; not a suggestion. Still less does it invite debate. It leaves nothing to our choice. It is an order, comprehensive and unequivocal, a clear, peremptory, categorical imperative: "Go!"

A Response-compelling Order

No one can read the New Testament without seeing that the evangelization of the world was the supreme thought of Christ. He came into the world to save it. He sought, not merely for the rich and influential, but for men as men, irrespective of their wealth or position. When the blind beggar cried out to him for help, he said unto him: "Go thy way; thy faith has made thee whole."<sup>4</sup> When

The Supreme Thought of Christ

<sup>1</sup> Acts i. 8.

<sup>2</sup> Luke xxiv. 50.

<sup>3</sup> Acts i. 9.

<sup>4</sup> Mark x. 52.

he saw the famishing multitude, he "had compassion on them, because they were as sheep not having a shepherd."<sup>1</sup> He could not bear to see men perish, and the thought of it caused him keenest agony. He was himself a missionary, and his entire ministry was a missionary ministry. While his earthly life was confined to Palestine, he made it clear that the scope of his purpose was world-wide. He plainly said: "Other sheep I have, which are not of this fold: them also I must bring, and they shall hear my voice."<sup>2</sup> He declared that "God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth on him should not perish, but have eternal life."<sup>3</sup> He taught the sublime truth of the Fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man. He broke down the partition wall between Jew and Gentile. In an age when men regarded men of other races as foes, he said: "Love your enemies." He showed the race-proud Jews that the Samaritan was their "neighbor." Going "into the borders of Tyre and Sidon," he saved a poor Syrophenician woman.<sup>4</sup> From heaven he gave Paul his commission to the Gentiles. With a vision of world conquest, he exclaimed: "I say unto you, that many shall come from the east and the west, and shall sit down with Abraham,

---

<sup>1</sup> Mark vi. 34.    <sup>2</sup> John x. 16.    <sup>3</sup> John iii. 16.    <sup>4</sup> Mark vii. 24-26.

and Isaac, and Jacob, in the kingdom of heaven."<sup>1</sup> "And I, if I be lifted up from the earth, will draw all men unto myself."<sup>2</sup>

And still the world's evangelization is his supreme thought. He is "the same yesterday and to-day, yea and for ever." He knows no distinction of race or caste. He loves men, and, as Phelps has said, the most attractive spots to him are "those which are crowded with the densest masses of human beings." Now, as of old, the Son of Man looks upon a sorrowing, dying world with pity unutterable. This is the attitude of the divine heart. Christ said that when the prodigal "was yet afar off, his father saw him, and was moved with compassion, and ran, and fell on his neck and kissed him." Seeing him "afar off" of course means that he was looking for him, gazing often and with fatherly yearning far down the road on which he hoped and prayed and knew that the wanderer would soon come.

His love seeks the most distant. We complacently imagine that God loves us more than any other people; but the Shepherd who left the ninety and nine sheep in the wilderness and sought the one that was lost is surely most tenderly solicitous, not about us in our comfortable, gospel-lightened homes, but about the oppressed blacks of Africa and the starv-

His Supreme Thought Still

Desires Salvation of All

<sup>1</sup> Matt. viii. 11.

<sup>2</sup> John xii. 32.

ing millions of India. Whoever fancies that God does not love all men and that Christ does not desire the salvation of all men but dimly sees the truth. Jehovah is the God of the whole earth. Christ "is the propitiation for our sins; and not for ours only, but also for the whole world."<sup>1</sup>

The Heresy of Disobedience

Since the salvation of men is Christ's supreme thought, it should be ours. How is it possible for one who professes to follow Christ not to believe in missions, when missions are simply the organized effort to carry out the will of the Master? Men talk about heresy as if it related only to the creed. Jesus said, "I and the Father are one;" but he also said, "Go ye into all the world, and preach the gospel to the whole creation." Is it not as heretical to deny one statement as the other? Failure to do the will of Christ emasculates the essential idea of the Church. There may be a noble edifice, a large congregation, brilliant oratory, inspiring music; but if the Master's call is not heard and heeded, it cannot be a church of the living God.

Neglect is Unchristian

Those who are solicitous about the salvation of the heathen who die without having heard of Christ may well add some concern about the salvation of professed Christians who, with the Bible in their hands, the command of Christ sounding in their ears, and the condition of the lost world before their eyes, manifest but languid interest in the effort to save the world. It is difficult to understand how those who profess to serve Christ can be indifferent to the most important work which Christ has committed to his followers, or how they can expect his blessing while they neglect his specific injunction. "If a man love me, he will keep my word," said Christ<sup>1</sup>; and the word is, "Go, preach." These words surely mean that Christ intended every one of his disciples to have some part in the effort to make the gospel known to all men, either by personally going or by giving toward the support of those who do go. The obligation is laid upon the conscience of every Christian. This majestic enterprise is of divine authority. When a young clergyman asked the Duke of Wellington whether he did not deem it useless to attempt to convert India, the great general sternly replied, "What are your marching orders, sir?" If we believe in Christ, we must believe in foreign missions.

<sup>1</sup> 1 John ii. 2.

Foreign missions, therefore, is not a side issue, the object of an occasional "collection"; it is the supreme duty of the Church, the main work of the Church. So the first disciples understood it, for they immediately went forth

Supreme Duty of the Whole
Church

<sup>1</sup> John xiv. 23.

as missionaries. It is interesting to note that the word "apostle" is derived from a Greek word which means one sent forth, a messenger, and that the word "missionary" comes from an original which is simply the Latin equivalent of the Greek apostle. The foreign missionary, like the apostles, goes away from home to preach the gospel to the scattered nations of the earth; and nothing brings us closer to the spirit and practise of the early Church than the comparison of the missionary methods of to-day with those of the New Testament.

"The Whole Creation"

We may well be awed by the majesty of Christ's declaration; a lonely Nazarene, surrounded by a handful of humble followers, calmly bidding them carry his teaching to the most distant nations. They were not to confine their efforts to their own country. "The whole creation" must be reached. No exceptions are to be made. Christ did not say, "Teach all nations, save those that you deem beneath you;" nor did he say, "Preach to every creature, except the Hindu and Buddhist and Mohammedan, who have religions of their own." He made the scope of his command absolutely universal.

A Redeemed Earth

It is the purpose of God, said Paul, "to reconcile all things unto himself." We should never lose sight of the grandeur of this conception. Christianity is not a life-boat sent out to a sinking ship to rescue a few passengers and let the rest go to the bottom. It will save all the passengers, unless they refuse to be saved, and it will save the ship. The Church looks to a redeemed earth. Let us hope and pray and work for nothing short of that stupendous consummation. Limiting the grace of God, doubting its adequacy for all men, acting as if it were for America and not for Africa and the islands of the sea, are sins against the Holy Ghost.

These are and ever must remain the primary motives of the missionary enterprise. There are others, however, of a secondary character, which are influential with many people and which may be briefly enumerated.

Secondary
Motives

1. In many ways the missionary is "the advance agent of civilization." As the product of centuries of Christian civilization, with all its customs and ideals, he appears in a rude village in Africa. He opposes slavery, polygamy, cannibalism, and infanticide. He teaches the boys to be honest, sober, and thrifty; the girls to be pure, intelligent, and industrious. He induces the natives to cover their nakedness, to build houses, and to till the soil. He inculcates and exemplifies the social and civic virtues. His own home and his treatment of his wife and daughters are object-lessons in a community which has always treated woman

Civilization

as a slave. The inertia of long-established heathenism is hard to overcome, but slowly it yields to the new power, and the beginning of civilized society gradually appears. Volumes might be filled with the testimonies of statesmen, travelers, and military and naval officers to the value of missionary work from this view-point, and the cumulative power of this class of evidence is doubtless a large factor in the growing respect for missions in the public mind. This motive appeals more particularly to persons of the intellectual type.

Philanthropy

2. The philanthropic motive is stirred by the consciousness of human brotherhood and the natural desire to relieve the appalling suffering and ignorance which prevail throughout the heathen world. Christ is the Great Physician now as of old. As we see the prevalence of disease and misery, the untended ulcers, the sightless eyes to which the surgeon's skill could bring light, the pain-racked limbs pierced with red-hot needles to kill the alleged demon that causes the suffering, and the fevered bodies that are made ten times worse by the superstitious and bungling methods of treatment, our sympathies are profoundly moved, and we freely give and labor that such agony may be alleviated. Medical missions with their hospitals and dispensaries strongly appeal to this motive, as do also educational missions with their teaching of the principles of better living. The gospel itself is sometimes preached and supported from this motive, for it is plain that the sufferings of men are diminished and the dignity and the worth of life increased by the application of the principles of Christianity to human society. This motive appeals strongly to those of the emotional type.

Desire for Results

3. The argument from results is the most decisive with many people of the utilitarian type. They want to see that their money accomplishes something, to know that their investment is yielding tangible return. They eagerly scan missionary reports to ascertain how many converts have been made, how many pupils are being taught, how many patients are being treated. Telling them of successes achieved is the surest method of inducing them to increase their gifts. Mission boards often find it difficult to sustain interest in apparently unproductive fields, but comparatively easy to arouse enthusiasm for fields in which converts are quickly made. The Churches are eager and even impatient for results. Fortunately, in many lands results have been achieved on such a scale as to satisfy this demand. But in other lands not less important weary years have had to be spent in preparing the soil and sowing the seed, and hard-working missionaries have been half disheartened by the insistent popular demand for accounts of baptisms before the harvest-time has fairly come.

These Motives Increasingly Emphasized

There is, apparently, a growing disposition to exalt this whole class of motives. The basis of the missionary appeal has noticeably changed within the last generation. Our commercial, humanitarian, and practical age is more impressed by the physical and the temporal than the actual and the utilitarian. The idea of saving men for the present world appeals more strongly than the idea of saving them for the next world, and missionary sermons and addresses give large emphasis to these motives. We need not and should not undervalue them. They are real. It is legitimate and Christian to seek the temporal welfare of our fellow men, to alleviate their distresses, to exalt woman, and to purify society. It is, moreover, true and to the credit of the missionary enterprise that it widens the area of the world's useful knowledge, introduces the conveniences and necessities of Christian civilization, and promotes wealth and power; while it is certainly reasonable that those who toil should desire to see some results from their labor and be encouraged and incited to renewed diligence by the inspiring record of achievements.

But these motives are nevertheless distinctly secondary. The benefits mentioned are effects of the missionary enterprise rather than primary motives for it, and the true Christian would still be obliged to give and pray and work for the evangelization of the world, even if not one of these motives existed. Moreover, with the wider diffusion of knowledge, some of these considerations are becoming relatively less important. Japan, India, and the Philippines have schools which give excellent secular training, and philanthropic institutions under secular auspices, though undoubtedly due to Christian influences, are beginning to come into existence. As for civilization, some non-christian lands already have civilizations of their own, more ancient than ours, and, so far as moral questions are not involved, quite as well adapted to their needs, while our own civilization is not by any means wholly Christian. Whether men are civilized or not, we must continue our missionary work. The achievements of a hundred years of missionary effort are encouraging; but if they were not, our duty would not be affected. We are to do what is right, though we never see visible results. Christ's life was a failure, from the view-point of his own generation; so were the efforts of Paul and Peter and Stephen; but later generations saw the rich fruitage. Like them, the true missionary toils from motives that are independent of present appearances. He knows that he is working with God, for God, and in obedience to God, and, with Faber, he is confident that in the end,

"He always wins who sides with God;
With Him no chance is lost."

Aims to be Kept in Mind

It is important that we should have a clear idea of the aim of the missionary enterprise. Of course, all know in a general way that it is proposed to "convert the heathen"; but beyond that, many who support the work and even some who apply for appointment appear to have only vague ideas. But the missionary movement is not a mere crusade. It has certain definite aims, and these aims must be kept clearly in mind if the work is to be intelligently and efficiently done.

A Personal Savior

First of all, the aim is to present Christ so intelligently to men that they will accept him as their personal Savior.

The Gospel Intelligently Known

Emphasis should be laid upon the word "intelligently." This idea excludes the hurried and superficial presentation of the gospel. It is not enough to go into a non-christian community, proclaim Christ for a few days or months, and then pass on, in the belief that we have discharged our responsibility. Even Americans and Europeans with all their general knowledge do not grasp new ideas so quickly as that, and we cannot reasonably expect other races to do so. To a large part of the non-christian world, Christ is still unknown, even by name, and a great majority of those who have heard of him know him only in such a general way as most people in this country have heard of Mencius or Zoroaster. Of his real character and relation to men, they know nothing, nor does it ever occur to them that they are under any obligation to him. Moreover, what little they have heard of him as a historical personage is beclouded and distorted by all the inherited and hostile presumptions of age-old prejudices, superstitions, and spiritual deadness. In such circumstances to make Christ intelligently known is apt to be a long and perhaps a wearisome effort. Bishop Boone in China toiled ten years before his heart was gladdened by one solitary convert. Tyler in South Africa saw fifteen laborious years pass before the first Zulu accepted Christ, while Gilmour preached for twenty years in Mongolia before visible results appeared. After the Asiatic mind once fairly grasps the new truth, progress usually becomes more rapid; but at first, and sometimes for long periods, it is apt to be painfully slow. The missionary and the Church that supports him often have need of patience.

Spiritual End in View

In urging emphasis on the evangelistic phases of the work, we are not unmindful of the value of other forms of missionary activity. The missionary is following the example of Christ in alleviating the bodily sufferings of men, while it is absolutely necessary to translate and print the Bible, to create a Christian literature, to teach the young and to train them for leadership in the coming Church. Man must be influenced at every stage of his career and shown that Christianity is adapted to his present state as well as to his future life. Nevertheless, hospitals and schools and presses are means, not ends. They are of value just in proportion as they aid the evangelistic effort, either by widening its opportunity or by conserving its results. The aim is not philanthropic or educational or literary, but spiritual. It is a new birth, an internal, not an external transformation, that men most vitally need. The external transformation will follow.

An Indigenous
Church

This personal presentation of Christ with a view to men's acceptance of him as Savior is to issue as soon as possible in the organization of converts into self-propagating, self-supporting, and self-governing churches. This is a vital part of the missionary aim. Christianity will not control a nation's life as long as it is an exotic. It must become an indigenous growth. To this end, effort must be put forth to develop the independent energies of the converts. The new convert is usually a spiritual child, and like a physical child, he must be for a time "under tutors and governors"; but the instruction looks to the development of self-reliant character. In the words of Lawrence: "God's great agent for the spread of his kingdom is the Church, . . . and missions exist distinctly for the Church. . . . Then the Church of each land, thus planted, must win its own people to Christ."<sup>1</sup>

SUGGESTIONS FOR USING THE QUESTIONS

Most of these questions are thought questions. That is, they require for their answers some original thinking. This form of question has been chosen for insertion in the text-book (1) because questions which constitute a mere memory test of the facts of the text can easily be constructed by any leader or member who makes an outline of the principal facts, and (2) because mere memory questions, although they have their uses, yield far less than thought questions either in mental development or in permanent impression. In some cases complete answers will be found in the text-book; usually statements that will serve as a basis for inference; but a few questions appeal solely to the general knowledge and common sense of the student. The greatest sources of inspiration and growth will be, not what the text-book adds to the student, but what the student adds to the text-book; the former is only a means to the latter.

---

<sup>1</sup> Lawrence, Modern Missions in the East, 31.

26 Why and How of Foreign Missions

In using these questions, therefore, let the leader first gather from the chapter or from previous chapters all that relates to the subject. It will be found profitable to jot down this material so that it will be all under the eye at once; then think, using freely all the knowledge, mental power, and reference books available. For the sake of definiteness, conclusions should be written out. It is not supposed that the average leader will be able to answer all these questions satisfactorily; otherwise, there would be little left for the class session. The main purpose of the session is to compare imperfect results and arrive at greater completeness by comparison and discussion.

It is not probable that the entire list of questions will be used in any one case, especially when the sessions last only an hour. The length of the session, the maturity of the class, and the taste of the leader will all influence the selection that will be made. In many cases the greatest value of these questions will be to suggest others that will be better. Some of the questions will require more mature thought and should be made the basis of discussion.

There has been no attempt to follow the order of paragraphs in the text-book in more than a general way.

QUESTIONS ON CHAPTER I

AIM: TO DETERMINE AN ADEQUATE AIM FOR FOREIGN MISSIONS BASED UPON ADEQUATE PERSONAL MOTIVES

1. What is your definition of a Christian?
2. What are the principal privileges of the Christian life? Arrange in the order of their importance.

3. How do they seem to you to compare in value with mental or physical benefits?
4. To what part of mankind are these privileges open?
5. Is there anything in the nature of these privileges that would especially lead you to share them?
6. What would you take to permit your sister, or daughter, to grow up from infancy in heathen society?
7. Would she not have a chance of being saved, if she lived up to the light she had?
8. Would you be satisfied to have her merely surrounded by the influences of Christian society?
9. What would she miss by not having a personal knowledge of Christ?
10. What parts of the world seem to you to be in the most need of Christianity?
11. What do you understand to be the purpose for which Christ came into the world?
12. How wide-reaching was this purpose?
13. What place did it have in his thoughts?
14. How did he expect it to be carried out?
15. What passages of Scripture can you quote in support of your opinions on the last three questions?
16. What do you consider the principal personal obligations resting on every Christian?
17. What is the relation of these obligations to the privileges of the Christian life?
18. What claim has foreign missions upon Christians who happen to be interested in other things instead?
19. What place ought it to occupy in the prayer and giving and service of the average Christian at home?

28 Why and How of Foreign Missions

20. Word what seems to you the strongest motive for pursuing the work of foreign missions.
21. Are there any reasons why the responsibility of the present generation is greater than that of those that are past?
22. Tell all the things you would need to know and do, in order to make Christ intelligently known in a heathen village, where he had never been preached.
23. Would it be sufficient to make a correct statement of the way of salvation just once to each individual in the village?
24. Would you consider that you had fulfilled your Christian duty to your own brother when you had done that much for him?
25. What is there in the two cases that is not parallel?
26. Should we expect our missionaries in person to make Christ intelligently known to each individual of the heathen world?
27. By what agency will the mass of the non-christian world be evangelized?
28. What is the principal aim of the foreign missionary force?
29. To what extent will the civilizing motive contribute to this aim?
30. To what extent, the philanthropic motive?
31. In what way might the desire for results hinder the complete realization of this aim?
32. In view of the combined motives for foreign missionary work, how does its claim on the individual Christian and on the Christian Church seem to you to compare with that of other causes?

FOREIGN MISSIONARY
ADMINISTRATION

The great problem in the administration of missions is to combine in due proportions decentralization in the conduct of details and centralization in the settlement of principles. On the importance of the former all are agreed; but not on the value of the latter. There has sometimes been a tendency to resent the control of a central body on the ground that its members cannot know the mission as well as those actually in the field. To a large extent, however, the reverse is the case. The central body, no doubt, cannot know the details of any one particular mission so well as the missionaries in that mission; but those missionaries only know their own mission, while the central body can know, and often does know, the missions of the society generally, and in considering questions of missionary policy and method the experiences of several missions is often the best guide for the administration of any one of them. Moreover, the central body generally comprises not only clergymen and laymen in the home Church who have made a careful study of the missionary problems, but also retired missionaries of long experience from different parts of the world, and civil and military officers who have been the friends and supporters of missions in the countries where they served, particularly in India. —Eugene Stock

II

MISSIONARY ADMINISTRATION

WORLD evangelization being the supreme work of the Church, the method of administration should be commensurate in scope and dignity with the task to be performed. Such a work cannot be properly done by individuals, nor by congregations acting separately. It is too vast, the distance too great, the single act too small. Local churches do not have the experience in dealing with missionary problems, nor the comprehensive knowledge of details necessary for the proper conduct of such an enterprise. Moreover, the individual may die or lose his money. The single church may become indifferent or discouraged. Even if neither of these alternatives happened, the work would lack stability. It would be fitful, sporadic, too largely dependent upon accidental knowledge or temporary emotion. A chance newspaper article or a visit from some enthusiastic missionary might direct a disproportionate stream of gifts to one field, while others equally or perhaps more important would be neglected. The wise expenditure of large sums of money in far

A Central Agency
Necessary

32 Why and How of Foreign Missions

distant lands, the checks and safeguards essential to prudent control, the equitable distribution of workers and forms of work, the proper balancing of interests between widely scattered and isolated points, the formulation of principles of mission policy—all these require a central administrative agency.

Vast Scale of Operations

The Board's Missionary work is for the most part carried on in remote places, far from the centers of finance. It is, moreover, a varied and complex work, including not only problems about churches, but also about day-schools, boarding-schools, industrial schools, normal schools; colleges, academic, medical, and theological; inquirers' classes, hospitals, and dispensaries; the translation, publishing, and selling of books and tracts; the purchase and care of property; the health and homes and furloughs of missionaries; fluctuating currencies of many kinds; negotiations with governments; and a mass of details little understood by the home Church. Problems and interrelations with other work are involved, which are entirely beyond the experience of the home minister, and which call for an expert knowledge, only possible to one who devotes his entire time to their acquisition.

A Church
Enterprise

It is neither safe nor businesslike for the Church to leave such an undertaking to outsiders. The Lord's work as well as man's work calls for business methods. The Church must itself take up this matter. It must form some responsible agency, whose outlook is over the whole field, and through which individuals and churches may work collectively and to the best advantage; some lens which shall gather up all the scattered rays of local effort and focus them where they are needed; some institution which, though "men may come and men may go," shall itself "go on forever."

Upon the necessity of a central administration for foreign missionary enterprise all religious bodies are agreed. And in all large missionary societies there is substantial agreement in important matters. Those with which we are most concerned as Churchmen are the two great societies within the Church of England, the Missionary Society of the Church of England in Canada, and the Domestic and Foreign Missionary Society, which is our own Church in America in its organized missionary capacity.

In 1701, largely through the efforts of the Rev. Thomas Bray, Commissary of the Bishop of London in Virginia, the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts was formed within the Church of England to minister among settlers in the North American colonies, and to plant the Church among Substantial Agreement of all Organizations as to Administration.

The Oldest Mission Board

34 Why and How of Foreign Missions

the native tribes that surrounded them. For almost a century it sent missionaries throughout the American colonies, founding churches, ministering to scattered groups of Church people, and urging the Church of England to send bishops to organize the work and to bring order and discipline into the missions. At the time of the American Revolution, almost all the clergy were missionaries of the S. P. G., and that Society had expended $2,000,000 for missions in America.

Early Work
among Indians

Work among the Indians was begun early, but, because of the recurring warfare and the consequent prejudice against missionary work on the part of both Indians and colonists, this part of the original plan was postponed so far as the United States was concerned.

Countries Entered

The Society entered Western Africa in 1752 and Central America in 1784. It is of special interest to us to note that the Rev. Thomas Thompson, the missionary of the S. P. G. in Monmouth County, New Jersey, volunteered for service in Africa in 1752 and was the first missionary to the Guinea Coast. Australia was reached in 1793, the East Indies in 1820, and other British colonies as they were established from time to time. North China was entered in 1863 and Japan in 1873.

Present
Summary

The Society has been spreading and strengthening its work ever since. In 1914 it had 4,312 stations; 1,291 foreign missionaries, of whom 941 are clergy, 47 laymen, and 303 lay-women. Its receipts for 1914 were $1,208,410.

The Church Missionary Society for Africa and the East was founded in 1799, its founders saying: "As the S. P. C. K. and the S. P. G. confine their labors to the British plantations in America and the West Indies, there seems to be still wanting in the established Church a Society for sending missionaries to the continent of Africa and other parts of the heathen world." Therefore "the persons present at this meeting do form a Society for that purpose."

The Largest
Missionary
Society

In 1853 at a general meeting the "Policy of Faith" was formally announced as follows: "The Committee state in the presence of this vast meeting and before the Church at large, their willingness to accept any number of true missionaries who may appear to be called of God to the work. They will send out any number, trusting to the Lord of the harvest, whose is the silver and the gold, to supply their treasury with the funds for this blessed and glorious undertaking."

"Policy of Faith"
Announced

This "Policy of Faith," has had a significant history. It was abandoned entirely in 1865, with a resulting seven years' famine; was partially acted upon in 1874-1876, and dropped

Its Later
Fortunes

36 Why and How of Foreign Missions

in 1877, with unhappy results; was adopted as a new thing in 1887, and in the following seven years the mission staff was doubled, all expenses were met, and a twenty thousand pound mortgage paid off. The Society to-day maintains it as an ideal.

C. M. S.
Development

The Church Missionary Society began the work of its principal missions in the following order: West Africa, 1804; India, 1813; New Zealand, 1814; Indians in British North America, 1822; China, 1844; Palestine, 1851; Japan, 1859; and Uganda, 1876. The Society in 1914 had 5,505 stations; 1,340 foreign and 10,325 native workers, of whom 407 and 454 respectively were in Holy Orders. These served 121,110 native communicants.

The Missionary Society of the Church of England in Canada

The Missionary Society of the Church of England in Canada was organized in 1883. Its early labors were largely devoted to the vast territories of western Canada, but latterly it has undertaken work in India, China, Japan, Africa, and South America. Its workers come in close contact with ours in China and Japan. Thus, one of the seven dioceses of the Nippon Sei Ko Kwai, or Holy Catholic Church of Japan, is that of Nagoya. Its support comes from the Canadian Church, which undertook this work and sent out a bishop in 1912. Again the Diocese of Honan, supported by the Canadian Church, is one of the eleven which compose the Chung Hua Sheng Kung Hui, or Holy Catholic Church of China. This Canadian Diocese was organized in 1910.

The latest report shows that the expenditure of the Society in 1914 was $90,818; that it had in the foreign field 16 ordained foreign missionaries (including 2 bishops), 3 lay workers (all of whom are medical men); 21 women workers; serving a total of 15 stations. Summary

Preparation for the Domestic and Foreign Missionary Society of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States of America

The missionary obligation was recognized by the General Convention in 1789 by "An Act of the General Convention" for supporting missionaries to preach the gospel in the frontiers of the United States, with annual sermons and offerings for this purpose. No immediate action was taken by the Church as a whole to carry out this resolution, but local missionary societies were organized. The Committee for the Propagation of the Gospel in New York State was formed toward the end of the eighteenth century, and the Rev. Philander Chase, afterward our pioneer western Bishop, was one of the earliest missionaries. In 1812, Early Domestic Mission
Movements

38 Why and How of Foreign Missions

the Society for the Advancement of Christianity in Pennsylvania was formed, largely through the efforts of the Rev. Jackson Kemper. In 1816 the Protestant Episcopal Missionary Society of Pennsylvania was founded, and was the first organization to work beyond the limits of its state.

Our Society and
the C. M. S.

In 1816, the Rev. Joseph Andrus volunteered for foreign missionary service, and in this connection Bishop Griswold and others proposed that he be sent to Ceylon by the C. M. S. and be supported by a society in the United States to be organized as a branch of the C. M. S. The Secretary of the C. M. S. replied in 1817: "The Committee have thought that the most effectual way of raising the missionary zeal in America would be the formation of a Church Missionary Society in the Episcopal Church in the United States, which however small in beginning might ultimately so increase as to produce the most extensive good. Should the formation of an American Episcopal Missionary Society be accomplished, the Committee of the Church Missionary Society authorize you to draw on me for the sum of Two Hundred Pounds to encourage the contributions of the friends of the Episcopal Church and the community at large." In accordance with these suggestions, in 1820, a Committee of the Protestant Episcopal Missionary Society of Pennsylvania, composed of the Revs. Kemper, Muhlenberg and Boyd, urged the formation of a general missionary society of the whole Episcopal Church to work in the two fields, the foreign and domestic. As a result of these and other influences, at a special meeting of the General Convention in 1821, the Domestic and Foreign Missionary Society of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States of America was organized.

Our debt to the S. P. G. was not forgotten on this occasion by Bishop White, who, as spokesman for the Board of Directors, proclaimed to the American Church that, "We stand in a relation to our brethren in the new States not unlike that which before the Revolution the Episcopal population in the Atlantic provinces stood toward their parent Church in England. What was then the conduct of that Church toward the forefathers of those who are now invited to imitate them in their beneficence? It was that she extended her fostering care to persons in their migration to the then uncultivated wilderness of the new world, and that she organized a society in which the prelates took the lead, being sustained by the most distinguished of the clergy of the whole realm."

Our Society and
the S. P. G.

The missionary example and help of the S. P. G. in the past and the active interest of Grateful Bonds the C. M. S. in the formation of the Domestic and Foreign Missionary Society have linked with gratitude all our mission work with that of the Church of England.

The Society is the Church
in its Missionary Capacity

The Society's first Constitution declared that, "It shall be composed of the Bishops of the Protestant Episcopal Church and the members of the House of Clerical and Lay Deputies of the General Convention of the said Church for the time being, and of such other persons as shall contribute by subscription three dollars or more annually to the objects of the institution during the continuance of such contributions, and of such as shall contribute at once thirty dollars, which contributions shall constitute them members for life. Members who pay fifty dollars on subscribing, shall be denominated patrons of the Society." It will be seen that the new Society being created by and composed of the official representatives of the whole Church was essentially that Church acting in its missionary capacity. However, the full realization of this fact came gradually.

Comprehends Whole Church Membership

At first the Church provided for the joining of its Missionary Society by the payment of contributions or dues, and did not fully recognize its obligation to send out into the mission field bishops as its representatives, fully qualified to act for the Church in the organization of new centers of corporate Christian life. But the conviction of the essential identity of the Domestic and Foreign Missionary Society with the Church grew, and in the memorable Convention of 1835, Article II, of the Constitution was changed to read, "The Society shall be considered as comprehending all persons who are members of the Church."

This realization of the true membership of the missionary society was paralleled by the recognition of the fact that it is the business of the whole Church to send bishops to mission fields instead of waiting for the formation of missions and their growth in strength and number sufficient to organize a diocese. The General Convention therefore elected the Rev. Jackson Kemper as Missionary Bishop of Missouri and Indiana, with jurisdiction in the Northwest. This included everything west of the Ohio except Michigan and Illinois.

Sixteen years earlier Bishop Chase had been elected Bishop of Ohio and two years earlier James Otey had been made Bishop of Tennessee, by conventions of five presbyters and a few laymen. Both had been consecrated and both had supported themselves and the work as best they could. The General Convention of 1835 recognized that this condition was an anomaly to the extent of voting to recognize the consecration and dioceses of these bishops

Episcopal Supervision of New Fields

Principle of Support
Recognized

42 Why and How of Foreign Missions

and to take some financial responsibility for their work.

Foreign Work Undertaken

The same Convention sent the Rev. Henry Lockwood and the Rev. Francis R. Hanson as the first missionaries to China, recognizing still further the world-wide responsibility of the whole Church.

Elective Direction

From time to time changes looking toward the perfecting of the missionary administration were made, until in 1910 the Convention adopted a missionary canon, which, together with some modifications made by the Convention of 1913, entirely reorganized the Board. The majority of the members of most mission Boards live in or near the city in which the Board is located, since thereby they can meet the more easily. The disadvantage of such a plan is evident. A Board so selected can hardly be representative of the whole Church. The first effort therefore of the new canon was to provide a Board which would represent the entire country. With this end in view the following regulations as to membership were laid down.

Choice of Members

Of its 48 members, half are to be elected by the General Convention, of which number eight must be bishops, eight priests, and eight laymen. The remaining 24 are elected by the eight Provincial Synods, one bishop, one priest, and one layman from each Province. This Provincial election is held at the meeting of the Synod which precedes the General Convention.

It is interesting and suggestive to note that the persons so chosen may or may not, at the discretion of the Synod, live in the Province which they are called upon to represent. Residence

For some years previous to 1910 the head executive officer of the Board had been called the "General Secretary." His duties had been similar to those of the general manager of a business corporation: in charge of, and responsible for everything, but not the presiding officer of the company. The new canon changed this by ordering that the president of the Board should become its executive head, and to this office for the statutory term of six years was elected the Rt. Rev. A. S. Lloyd, D.D., then Bishop Coadjutor of Virginia. Changed Canon as to Executive Officer

Obviously one man could not attend to all the affairs of an institution as large as the Board of Missions, and in realization of this fact the missionary canon of 1910 instructed the President to nominate to the Board for election a number of secretaries, whose duties should be the management of the several departments into which the work, at the President's discretion, should be divided. In carrying out this policy, the President appointed four secretaries; one to act as executive secre- Secretaries of Departments and Council of Advice

44 Why and How of Foreign Missions

tary, another to direct the editorial work, another to carry on the educational work, and another to act as recording secretary. These four officers, together with the treasurer who is elected by the General Convention, and the first assistant treasurer, form the Council of Advice. Its powers are thus defined by the canon: "The scope of the powers of the Council of Advice shall be determined by the President subject to the approval of the Board."

Adjustment of Responsibility

This Council resembles somewhat the cabinet of the President of the United States, in that it is made up of heads of departments and meets regularly to discuss and act upon all matters of importance. The executive officers are, of course, only agents of the Board. The actual legislators are the bishops, priests, and laymen, selected to form the Board by the general Church. Upon them, as representatives of the Church, falls the "care of all the missions."

Four Board Meetings a Year

The Board of Missions, in order to perform its supremely important duties, meets four times a year. Most of its meetings are held at the Church Missions House, 281 Fourth Avenue, New York City, but in 1913, in response to a general demand, it was voted to hold, if possible, one meeting each year in church centers elsewhere. The statutory times for meetings are: the second Wednesday in February, the second Wednesday in May, the fourth Wednesday in September, and the second Wednesday in December. At these board meetings are discussed and decided all matters of large and general importance.

It can be readily seen that, since it only meets four times a year, and since the work is pressing all the time, it would be quite impossible for the Board to transact all that needs to be done. And yet it would be equally out of the question for 48 men of large affairs to come together from all parts of the country much more often than they do. However, meetings must be held, and accordingly there are chosen from the Board, an Executive Committee of 3 bishops, 3 priests, and 5 laymen, who, with the president and treasurer, meet once a month.

Executive Committee

To put it all in a nutshell, the business of the Board is handled as follows: first everything comes before the Council of Advice, meeting once a week. After discussion it makes "recommendations" to the Executive Committee. Most of these "recommendations" are considered and acted upon, favorably or unfavorably, at the monthly meetings of that Committee. There always remain, however, certain matters of general importance upon which the Executive Committee prefers

Sifting of Business

46 Why and How of Foreign Missions

not to adjudicate. Such are handed on to the Board for final action at their quarterly meetings.

Illustrations of Board's Business

What kind of things do the Committee and Board have to act upon? Here are one or two samples: A call comes from some District for reinforcements. The Bishop in charge reports such and such favorable openings and such and such "golden opportunities." Shall the Church assume this new and larger burden? Shall it authorize new work which will mean an addition to the budget of perhaps $20,000 a year? Obviously for an organization to depend largely on voluntary offerings to take this step, requires faith. Shall it be done?

Or again: An invitation comes for a world conference on missions, like that at Edinburgh. Shall the Board participate and send representatives? Or again: A call comes for more interest in the work among the Negroes. What shall the Board do? And what policy shall it recommend in the expenditure of the money which it appropriates? Such, and an infinite number of smaller problems are presented to the officers week after week, and one can truly say that, if the Board needs the help of the Church financially, it needs equally, if not more, the prayers of all Church people, that it may be guided as it deals month after month with hundreds and hundreds of matters, large and small, each and every one of which has its degree of importance in furthering the kingdom of God.

Once a year the Board publishes a Report in which may be found a record of all its acts, as well as statements from the bishops of various missionary jurisdictions as to the progress of their work during the year. In addition to this official report there is the monthly periodical, The Spirit of Missions. In it will be found all the current news which, emanating as it does from the office of the Editorial Secretary, has the nature of an official monthly report.

Adequate Reports

The deepest problem which confronts the Board is, of course, that of arousing the missionary ambition of the Church. So far as the fields are concerned, they are more than white for the harvest. Each year requests come for support of all sorts and conditions of new undertakings. There is not a worker anywhere who cannot tell of a large number of things which he ought to be doing, but which he cannot do for lack of funds. In all quarters doors of opportunity are wide open, and ten times the number of workers could be kept busy if the Board could support them. This being so, the problem before the Board consists not only in converting the heathen, but in converting the Church—in making every man, woman, and child in the Church missionary-hearted.

Problem of Advance

48 Why and How of Foreign Missions

The Need for Education

How is this to be done? Through education in the widest use of that word. But there is a deeper significance to education than is often realized. Not only is it true that people must be informed before they can become interested; it is equally true that unless the people become informed we can hardly hope to go ahead in the future as rapidly as we have in the past. How many people are giving to-day merely because their rectors have asked them to? What proportion of those now giving to the apportionment ever actually go down on their knees at home and pray for that on behalf of which they are giving? Giving without prayerful concern will not go on forever. If the work is to grow and grow, then the people must more and more become intimately acquainted with the Why and the How and the Where and the What of the Church's world-wide work. Hence, the biggest problem before the Board is that of educating the Church. That the Church wants to be educated could quickly be ascertained by spending a day in the Missions House. From Maine to California inquiries flood in. To the Educational Secretary alone during February, 1915, came 2,277 letters. This shows the extent to which mission study is carried on.

One large question is, To what length should the educational campaign be carried? Some would have us descend altogether to the level of the business house and advertise and promote along the lines adopted by some big corporations. But can we go that far? If not, how far should we go? At present the Educational Department has four divisions: Library, Mission Study, Exhibit, and Stereopticon. How many more should it have? Its aim is to develop mission study in one form or another in every parish in the Church. With this end in view each diocese has its own Diocesan Educational Secretary, associated with whom should be an Educational Secretary or leader in every parish, and associated with the last should be an educational leader in every parish organization from the Men's Club down to the Infant Class of the Sunday-school.

Is there a Limit to Publicity
Methods?

Through the Forward Movement an endeavor is made to develop in every parish the habit of systematic giving to missions. In order to do this, it seeks to organize the forces within the Church. The detailed methods for securing organization and advance are: 1. The formation in every diocese of an efficient missionary committee for the purpose of cooperating with the bishop and other diocesan authorities in developing the sense of diocesan

The Forward
Movement

50 Why and How of Foreign Missions

responsibility for the furtherance of the Church's mission. 2. The formation, through the work of these diocesan committees, of congregational committees in every congregation to cooperate with the rector in developing the sense of congregational responsibility for the furtherance of the Church's mission. 3. The substitution for the haphazard method of missionary support through the occasional offering, of the systematic plan of a canvass of the congregation, in order that every member, whether a communicant or not, may have his responsibility presented to him personally and intelligently and may have the opportunity of indicating what amount per week he desires to subscribe. 4. The general use of a simple collecting device, such as the duplex envelope, in order that, wherever desired, offerings for missions may be made weekly at the time that the subscriptions for the current expenses of the congregation are paid.

Provincial Secretaries

With so vast a territory as the United States, and with so many dioceses, it would be obviously impossible to direct and guide everything from the Missions House unless considerable help and advice were furnished from without. Realizing this, the canon provides for certain auxiliaries. In the first place, there are the Provincial Secretaries. They are elected, subject to the approval of the Board of Missions, by the Provincial Synods, and hold office "during the pleasure of" the Board, under the direction of the President. They journey about their several departments informing people about the Board and its needs.

The Provincial Synods are the outgrowth of the old Department Councils—a fact, by the way, which shows how it has been through its missionary work that the Church progresses. The great forward step of organizing Synods would perhaps have been years longer in coming, had it not been for the missionaries and their zeal. Can the reader tell of any other advantages which have come to the home Church as a result of its interest in things abroad? There have been many. The Provincial Synods, meeting every year—save in that in which the General Convention assembles—elect, as has been already shown, Secretaries and Board officers; promote the holding of missionary meetings, and take "all such measures to foster missionary interest within the Province as are not inconsistent with the Constitution and Canons of the General Convention, or of any diocesan or missionary jurisdiction within the Province. A further regulation of much importance is that "each Province shall have the right to require that the Board of Missions in making an annual apportionment shall make such apportionment in gross, for subdivision by the Provincial Synod thereof as the said Synod may determine." A large question which may be opened at any time is—how much more authority shall the Synods have? Some would have the House of Bishops delegate to them the power to elect to vacant Sees within their boundaries. Information concerning the Provinces will be found in Canon 55, Article 11, Section 12.

Provincial Synods

Board Reports

In order to bring to the General Convention full information concerning the acts of its Missionary Committee, which is in reality what the Board of Missions is, the Canon provides that "a triennial report shall be made to each General Convention, which report shall be the order of the day on the third day of each session. For the reception and discussion of the report, the House of Bishops and the House of Deputies shall sit in joint session; but all action upon the report shall be taken by the concurrent vote of the two Houses meeting separately." Further than this, it is ordered that there shall be a Committee of two bishops, two presbyters, and two laymen together with the officers at the Missions House, to arrange with the Missionary Bishops and others to address joint sessions of the Houses upon the needs, conditions, and opportunities for Church extension in the several fields. This Committee also arranges for the holding of public missionary mass meetings during the Convention.

In 1871 the Woman's Auxiliary was created by the Board of Missions. It was organized along parochial and diocesan lines, gradually drawing within itself women's associations previously formed in aid of special departments of mission work. These Woman's Auxiliary branches are now to be found in every diocese and missionary district of the Church. The purpose of the Woman's Auxiliary to promote prayer, study, work, and giving for missions has been constantly placed before its members, and its practical aid to the Board may be inferred from the fact that it now contributes over $350,000 in money and the value of boxes yearly, and a Triennial United Offering of thanks given over and above these regular gifts, which during the last Triennial (1910-1913) reached the amount of $306,496.

Woman's Auxiliary

In 1889 the General Convention, sitting as the Board of Missions, authorized the Junior Department of the Woman's Auxiliary to enlist the young people of the Church in missionary service. This department, for purposes of greater interest and activity among its members, has been formed into three sections: Section I, Little Helpers, composed of children

Junior Department of the Woman's Auxiliary

54 Why and How of Foreign Missions

from baptism to eight years of age; Section II, ages eight to sixteen; Section III, sixteen and over.

The Sunday School
Auxiliary to the Board of Missions

In October, 1898, the Sunday-schools contributing to the Lenten Offering were recognized as the Sunday School Auxiliary to the Board of Missions. Its gifts are made chiefly during Lent, when special mite boxes are distributed for the purpose. Many schools, however, begin their offering in Advent, and some keep adding to it throughout the year. Missionary instruction during the Sunday-school session and at other times, the circulating of missionary books, pamphlets, and the Children's Number of The Spirit of Missions, are the methods used to develop interest in the offering. The amounts given each year have increased remarkably. In 1878, the first offering was $7,000; in 1894, the seventeenth offering was $59,000; in 1902, the twenty-fifth offering was $110,000; in 1908, the thirty-first offering was $137,000; in 1910, $144,694.35 was given by 4,046 schools, and in 1914, $181,183.67 by 3,945 schools.

The Foreign Mission Fields
Occupied

Foreign countries were occupied by the Church through the Domestic and Foreign Society as follows: Greece, 1830-1898; Crete, 1837-1843; Persia, 1835-1850; South America, 1859-1864; and from 1905 to the present time. Africa was entered in 1835, China in 1835, Japan in 1859, Haiti in 1865, and Mexico in 1869.

The American Church Missionary Society, an independent undertaking which had been launched in 1860, entered Cuba in 1888, Brazil in 1889, Haiti in 1861; and after doing a valuable work turned over in 1865 to the Domestic and Foreign Missionary Society the Haitian work, and that in Cuba and Brazil in 1905.

Fields First Opened by American
Church
Missionary
Society

So much for the Board and its method of procedure. Let us next look at its resources and income. To support all the undertakings which look to the general Church for assistance, required in the year from September first, 1913, to September first, 1914, the sum of $1,417,752. When one considers the fact that fifty years ago, that is to say, for the year 1863-1864, the Board's income was $143,539 and that twenty-five years ago, 1888-1889, it was $325,724, one wonders how large the operations of the Board will be twenty-five years from now. Of course we must always remember that while it is comparatively easy to double a hundred dollars it is more than ten times as hard to double a thousand. A city of 10,000 can increase to 20,000 in a few years, but one of a million does not increase to two million with equal rapidity. Still unless an institution grows it dies, and we may

Resources and Income

56 Why and How of Foreign Missions

well wonder what the future appropriations of the Board will be. The above mentioned sums do not represent any strain upon the resources of a Church which numbers over 1,032,000 communicants.

How the Board is Supported

How was this money raised? In the first place there is the apportionment. In order that each congregation might know its minimum share in the support of our missions, the General Convention in San Francisco in October, 1901, instructed the Board of Missions to divide the budget each year among the dioceses and districts. Hence the Apportionment Plan.

Finding the Minimum

To determine the minimum share of each diocese the Board of Missions ascertains, from the diocesan journal, the average of the total receipts of all the congregations in the diocese for five years. The dioceses are then grouped into classes, and those in each class are asked to give certain percentages of their total receipts, the wealthiest giving the largest percentage. The dioceses in each succeeding class give a smaller percentage of their total receipts, and so on down the list to the poorer dioceses, which are those whose total receipts are less than $50,000. They give the smallest percentage.

How Apportioned

The Board is always open to suggestions, and if a more equitable method of apportioning its budget can be invented it would be only too glad to adopt it. The diocesan authorities are expected to divide the amounts apportioned to them among the congregations, and the clergyman in charge of each congregation is asked to publish the amount suggested as the congregational offering so that every member of every congregation in the country may know the minimum amount his or her congregation is asked to give in order that the Church's mission may be adequately maintained.

For many years the sums given by various Auxiliaries were not counted in the apportionment, but in 1911 it was decided to centralize and equalize the burden. Accordingly all contributions, save specials, of which more later, are now counted in with the parishes' apportionments. Thus in a given parish there will be several sources of income: that from the special Sunday offering, from the duplex envelopes, from the men's missionary club, from the Woman's Auxiliary, from the Junior Auxiliary, from the Sunday School Auxiliary, from the Little Helpers, from the St. Paul's Brotherhood. Since 1911 all of these go in as part of the one offering which on the books of the Board is put down to the credit of that parish. In some instances, just as the diocese divides up its apportionment among the

Recent Unified Offering

58 Why and How of Foreign Missions

parishes, rectors divide their parochial apportionment among the various auxiliaries and societies in their parishes.

Not a Tax

It must be borne clearly in mind that just as one cannot call his voluntary subscription for the support of a Church or hospital a tax, neither can the apportionment be called a tax or an assessment. It is not intended to be taken as a measure of the giving ability of any diocese or congregation. It is simply an endeavor to divide fairly among all members of the Church an expense common to all. Many congregations are able to give more than their apportionment and take pride in doing so. It is hard for us to realize how the work was ever carried on before the apportionment idea was put in operation. At all events we can see how greatly matters have been helped by the system.

Growth in Main Source of Gifts

Contributions from congregations and individuals as distinct from Sunday-schools and Woman's Auxiliary have largely increased. In 1901, the offerings from congregations and individuals were $235,993.81; in 1914, they were $749,935.22, or a gain of $513,941.41. In the thirteen years, the number of contributing congregations have increased from 1,993 in 1901 to 6,022 in 1914. In 1902, the first year of the Apportionment Plan, eight dioceses and ten missionary districts completed their apportionment—a total of eighteen. In 1914, fifteen dioceses and twenty-one missionary districts completed their apportionment—a total of thirty-six.

But the apportionment does not supply all the income needed for the year's work by the Board. As against an expense of nearly a million and a quarter, the apportionment only supplied $1,047,312.92. This left a further amount of $370,439.49 to be provided.

Income Aside from Apportionment

This was received from undesignated legacies, interest on endowments, the United Offering of the Woman's Auxiliary, and reserve deposits. On an average during the last ten years, the Board has received $100,000 a year from undesignated legacies. These moneys have been used for running expenses, but a feeling has arisen in some quarters to the effect that money received in wills should be invested as endowment, not spent. This presents a most interesting problem. When A. B. wills ten thousand dollars to the Board of Missions does he or she intend that the said sum shall be kept and the interest only expended? As a solution to this question it has been proposed that ten per cent. of the sums received from undesignated legacies shall be expended on buildings in the mission field, and that each year the amount so disposed of shall be increased. Some would have it that

Expenditure of Legacies

60 Why and How of Foreign Missions

no money ever received from wills shall be spent save upon the erection of buildings or the creation of endowments. The debates upon these points in the Board meetings have been very interesting. For the year 1913-14, as a matter of fact, ten per cent. was so set aside for use in the domestic field.

Special Contributions

In the first place, what is a "special"? Whenever for personal association or other reasons any one asks the Board of Missions to send a gift to some missionary or some particular object not already supported by an appropriation of the Board, or when the giver wishes to send an additional gift to some person or object receiving an appropriation from the Board, which shall be over and above whatever appropriation is received, this extra gift is called a "special."

How Applied

"Specials" do not apply on the apportionment, since the Board of Missions cannot use special gifts to pay the appropriations, but must send them to the fields named by the donor, in addition to the appropriation.

Irregular Factor

As to "specials," a very general misunderstanding of the Board's attitude toward them has too long been prevalent. The problem in a nutshell is as follows: If we are to have a central administrative body it is necessary that that body shall have the general direction of the work. Further, if we are to insure permanence of undertakings we must so build that nothing shall depend upon the money-gathering ability of one or two men. For example, a most persuasive personality may receive large sums for some special work, but what is there to guarantee that he will be succeeded by an equally successful leader? In fact, experience has shown that wherever a mission station is built up solely on special donations, obtained by some one worker, its existence is problematical. Sooner or later a poor "beggar" is selected to take charge and then a burden falls on the Board—a burden which it had no share in creating. On the other hand, when a station is dependent upon a society or board, its existence is assured, since a Board's income is not dependent upon the very perplexing and uncertain element of popularity. This has been stated by one writer in the following words:

"It is a singular fact that so many donors fancy that they can get information as to the best use to be made of their gifts through individual appeals, rather than by taking the united judgment of the missionaries on the ground and the executive committees at home." The effort to evangelize the world must not degenerate into a sporadic and spasmodic individualism. A board cannot spend $50,000 this year on a mission which has happened to have several good speakers at home on furlough, and $30,000 the next year because the furloughed missionaries from that field were ill or ineffective on the platform. The scale on which money should be expended in a given field cannot be wholly determined by the amount of money offered for it, or the varying degree of success which a missionary may have in presenting it to home audiences, or the newspaper articles that may happen to interest a reader; but it must be decided by the relative needs of that field, the funds that are available for the whole enterprise, and the policy that has been adopted by the board. Otherwise, demoralizing elements of uncertainty and inequality are introduced.

Element of Individualism

62 Why and How of Foreign Missions

Perplexities and Dangers

There are, moreover, administrative perplexities involved in such excessively specialized giving. Suppose a citizen should refuse to contribute toward the expenses of his community unless his money could be applied to the grading of the street in front of his house, or the salary of the teacher who instructs his children. How could the administration of any municipality be conducted, if each man insisted on having some particular item of city expenditure assigned to him? The donor does not usually suspect the difficulties in his selection of a special object. He naturally chooses the most attractive phases of the work, while others less attractive but equally important are ignored. Such is the argument against "specials."

Having seen the difficulties associated with "specials" let us look at the other side of the question. It has been upon "specials" that missions have almost always depended for new beginnings. There is hardly a large undertaking in the field to-day that is not the result of the maligned "special." And it is natural that it should be so. The "special" provides a point of contact, a living relationship between the giver and the receiver. It is so hard to be enthusiastic about a Board! It is so easy to be enthusiastic about a special piece of work, in a certain place, about which one knows all the details. No one can be as concerned about a thing as about a person, and the Board is to most people a thing. Hence for educational purposes we must have specials—and we do. Still it must be remembered that if we have too many of them the Board would have to give up.

The Board has recently expressed in a formal way its attitude toward specials.

Recognizing the value of the "special" idea, the Board provides for it—for the natural and proper wish of contributors to give to particular objects—by assigning on request to individuals as their share of the Church's

Good Points about Specials

"Designated Offerings"

64 Why and How of Foreign Missions

burden some object already included within the annual appropriation. "Designated Offerings" differ from specials in the fact that the gifts are for objects included in the budget of appropriations, and help the Church to meet the obligations it has assumed through its agent, the Board. Designated offerings are therefore properly credited to the parish or diocesan apportionment. Under this plan money is received, not for an individual scholar or patient or native worker, but for a share of the cost of a particular school or hospital or station. Larger gifts may be designated for the maintenance of an institution, or of an entire mission station.

Plan Gives Satisfaction

Plans such as these are proving satisfactory alike to givers, the Board, and the missionaries. It allows a flexible use of mission funds in accordance with the best judgment of the missionaries and the changing necessities of the work, provides a support for all departments and not simply for a few, makes it possible to furnish adequate information, gives room for steady advance of interest and gifts, instead of fixing limits, and insures the continuance of the gift to the permanent work uninfluenced by changes in personnel.

How the Board's Funds are Handled

Having discussed the Board's material resources something should be said about the manner in which they are handled. To begin with, it should be realized that it would take more time and money than it is worth for the treasurer to try and explain every single detail of the business in every report. Still anybody who cares to take the trouble can come to the Missions House and go through the books to his heart's content.

In the handling of money great care is taken. Not only is every dollar received promptly acknowledged to the giver, but a public report is made in the annual report and copies are given to any who request them.

Careful Financial Methods

The majority of the members and officers of the Board are or have been rectors, and the others are members and contributing lay officers of churches. They know, therefore, apart from the Board's correspondence, that the money they receive comes, not only from the rich, but from the poor; that it includes the widow's mite, the workingman's hard-earned wage, and that it is followed on its mission of blessing by the prayers of loving hearts. So the Board regards that money as a sacred thing, a trust to be expended with more than ordinary care.

A Sacred Trust

Some expenditure for administration is, of course, indispensable. The work could not be carried on without it, for a board must have offices and the facilities for doing its work. The scale of administration is largely deter-

Administration
Expenditure Indispensable

66 Why and How of Foreign Missions

mined by the ideas of the Church which the Board represents and the work that it is required to do. It is hardly fair to cite the low administrative expense of certain independent agencies, for they do not assume such responsibilities for the maintenance of their missionaries as the Church boards. The churches want their missionaries adequately supported for a life-work, and that involves an administrative agency commensurate in expensiveness with the obligations that must be assumed. Still, the cost of administration of the great mission boards is surprisingly low. The exact percentage varies, as some have free rentals and unpaid agents, and as the cost of stimulating the churches is not always considered administrative. In general, it may be said that the amount for administration proper ranges from six to nine per cent.

Remarkably Good Showing

Is there any mercantile concern doing a great business and requiring the services of a large number of persons scattered all over the world, whose percentage of expenditure for administration is so low? Professor Henry van Dyke once made inquiries of several large corporations, railway, manufacturing, and mercantile, and he found that the average cost of administration was 12.75 per cent., while in one great establishment it rose to twenty per cent. The manager of one of the large department stores in New York stated once that his expense for administration was twenty-two per cent., and he expressed astonishment that the Board's cost was less than one half of that. The cases are not entirely parallel; but after making all reasonable allowance for differences, the essential fact remains that the cost of missionary administration is as low as possible. About ninety-two cents out of every dollar goes to the field. The Rev. John Hall, of New York, once said: "I have been closely connected with the work for more than a quarter of a century, and I do not hesitate to say that it would be difficult to find elsewhere as much work done at so moderate a cost as in our mission boards."

One source of income open to the Board has not yet been mentioned: the Reserve Deposits. They are the solution to the difficulty created by the uncertainty and irregularity of income. The churches will not pay in advance. The average church does not even make pledges, and has no adequate system of raising money. The tide of beneficence ebbs and flows in the most startling ways, and of course the Board is often in danger of debt.

To meet payments in the early months of the fiscal year when the contributions are light and when the appropriations must be paid in regular amounts every month a fund for reserve deposits was given and set aside in order that the Board might thus be spared the necessity of borrowing money, which had been found unavoidable until these reserves were established. As an illustration, in the first six months of 1914 the appropriations were $708,876, while the contributions were only $378,075. To meet this situation the Reserve Deposits were called upon. Thus it will be seen that these deposits are of vital importance to the Board. Without them, now that the work has become so large, it would be almost impossible to continue operations. At the present moment, thanks to the munificence of some of the Board's friends, we have reserve deposits amounting to $742,864. As a further illustration of how essential to the work they are, it might be shown that in January, 1915, $495,000 of this amount was in use.

68 Why and How of Foreign Missions

A Work of Faith

It will be seen from all that has been said that there is no ground for the assumption of some that the work of a Church Board is not a faith work. At the beginning of each year, the Board makes and guarantees its appropriations solely on the faith that God will move the Church to provide the necessary money. Since he has ordained that this work shall be supported by the gifts of his people, it is fair to assume that he will bless them when they move unitedly and prayerfully for the accomplishment of the chief work that he has laid upon them, and that he is quite as apt to guide the men whom the Church "looks out" as "of good report, full of the Spirit and of wisdom" and appoints "over this business," as he is to guide any independent agency or individual, however sincere or enthusiastic.

These men regard the work as of divine authority and of beneficent character. They reverently look to the Holy Spirit as the administrator of the enterprise, believing that their chief reliance must be upon his guidance. They realize that God is not limited to human methods, and that the failure of a cherished plan may not argue injury to the cause, but only defects in the plan. They feel that their only safety is to keep close to Christ and to seek to know his will. Prayer, therefore, begins and pervades all deliberations, and wings every appeal for funds. Heavy as are the anxieties and responsibilities, every board counts it an honor and a privilege to represent the Church of God in the administration of this noblest of all Christian activities.

Divine Guidance
through Prayer

QUESTIONS ON CHAPTER II

AIM: TO UNDERSTAND THE MACHINERY THAT HAS BEEN CREATED BY THE CHURCH FOR CARRYING OUT ITS AIM

- I. How would foreign missionary work be conducted if we had no missionary boards?

70 Why and How of Foreign Missions

2. What would be the advantages of having each parish conduct its work on the foreign field directly and separately?
3. What would be the disadvantages of this arrangement?
4. How would the work on the field compare in equipment with that which is now conducted by the Board?
5. Sum up the principal features of the work of the Board of Missions, considered as a business enterprise.
6. How does it seem to you to compare in magnitude and difficulty with that of the other boards of the Church?
7. What sort of men should be secured as secretaries of boards of missions?
8. Name some of the principal subjects that board secretaries ought to be acquainted with.
9. How far can a board go with propriety in advertising its work?
10. What are the arguments for increased economy in the administration of the Board of Missions?
11. How is a board to advertise its work effectively, and yet escape the criticism of extravagance?
12. What is the Apportionment and what has it done?
13. What are the arguments for and against giving "Specials" for objects outside the budget?
14. What is a "Designated Offering"?
15. Under what circumstances should missionaries on furlough be permitted to solicit money for their own work?
16. What is the part of the individual parish in the matter?
17. What is the part of the individual Christian?

QUALIFICATIONS AND APPOINTMENT

The first point that I shall emphasize refers to your physical nature. You will want to take with you to your field of labor a sound, healthy, vigorous, and normally developed body.

—George Scholl

Let the most thoroughly disciplined faculties and the noblest powers of the Christian world be consecrated to work of such a character. We do not plead for missionaries to go forth to teach science, but for missionaries who possess a scientific mind; not for men to proclaim or teach the philosophies of the world, but for men who have as a part of their equipment a philosophic mind.

—S. H. Wainright

In the first place, only a man whose mind is pervaded by the immediate personal presence of the Holy Spirit can reveal Christ to those seeking him. The first great work which we have in any mission field is that of making Christ known to the people.

—James M. Thoburn

In the mission field abroad, as in fact at home, too, character counts for more than learning, for more than skill. Character, humanly speaking, is almost everything.

—Eugene Stock

III

QUALIFICATIONS AND APPOINTMENT

IT is a mistake to suppose that any nice, pious youth can become a foreign missionary. Careful Selection of Candidates The critic who imagines that weaklings or milksops can be appointed, might apply for appointment himself and see. Large churches, after spending a year or more in considering scores of highly recommended ministers, sometimes give a unanimous call to an unworthy man. So a board occasionally errs. But as a rule, the rigorous methods now employed quickly reject incompetent candidates, while the increasing missionary interest in colleges and seminaries gives the choicest material to select from. The boards do not appoint the pale enthusiast or the romantic young lady to the foreign field, but the sturdy, practical, energetic man of affairs, the woman of poise and sense and character. It is not the policy to send a multitude of common men, but a comparatively small number of picked men, the highest types of our Anglo-Saxon Christian character and culture. Imitating the example of the church at Antioch in setting apart as foreign missionaries Paul and Barnabas, the modern Church selects the best that apply for this service. The result is that foreign missionaries are fast becoming a picked class, far above the average in intelligence, character, and devotion.

Tests Imposed

We would not give the impression that the boards insist upon an impracticable standard, nor should modesty deter any young man or woman from applying. The tests imposed are not merely scholastic. Sometimes the honor members of a graduating class have been rejected and men of lesser academic distinction appointed, because investigation has shown that the latter gave better promise of real usefulness. High grades sometimes coexist with serious defects of character. Many of the prize men of our colleges are never heard of in after life, while others, who, like General Grant, made no special mark as students, have developed splendid qualities.

Qualifications

It may be well to indicate the qualifications that are required, not only for the guidance of young people who are contemplating application, but for the information of laymen who may not be familiar with the subject, and who often hear misleading statements regarding it.

Health

Foreign missionaries often live and work in such trying climates, amid such insanitary surroundings, exposed to such malignant diseases, and under such nervous strain, that only men and women of sound constitution and vigorous health should be appointed. It is important therefore to ascertain whether one is free from physical defects or tendencies that might shorten life. This question is one to be determined, not by the applicant, but by a physician, and the board insists on a rigid examination, usually by a physician of its own selection.

After thirty, one's ability to acquire a free, colloquial use of a foreign tongue rapidly diminishes. Moreover, one's ability to adapt himself to a different environment becomes less easy as the years pass. It is better that the transfer to new conditions and the study of a difficult language should begin before either the physical or intellectual life becomes so fixed that it is hard to acquire new things. The probable duration of effective service also shortens rapidly as one moves toward middle life. For these reasons, the boards do not like to accept any one over thirty-three, unless other qualifications are exceptionally high, in which case the age of acceptance is occasionally extended to thirty-five.

Age Limits

Graduation from both college and professional school is ordinarily required in men, and at least a high school training in women. The boards insist, too, that the student's record shall be such as to show that he pos-

Education

esses more than average intellectual ability. A considerable part of the work of the missionary is intellectual. His daily problems require a trained mind. Moreover, in many fields he comes into contact with natives whose mental acumen is by no means contemptible. While, therefore, a board will not reject a candidate because he does not stand near the head of his class, it will reject him if his grades indicate mediocrity. The considerations that occasionally lead the Church at home to ordain a man who has not had a full course may lead a board to send one to the foreign field, but such cases are exceptions.

Those Without Theological Training

Graduates of technical schools are needed yearly by the Board of Missions. Physicians are nearly always in demand. Colleges and boarding-schools frequently call for recruits who are specially qualified for teaching. Sometimes mechanical and electrical engineers are needed for special chairs. Several boards have sought graduates of industrial and agricultural colleges for industrial schools. Hospitals often ask for trained nurses to act as matrons and head nurses. Mission presses call for superintendents who understand printing, while some of the larger missions can use to excellent advantage laymen of commercial experience as treasurers, builders, and business agents. Of course the number that can be used in some of these ways is not great. The all-round candidate who can do anything that is assigned him is in chief demand.

The boards make careful inquiry as to executive ability and force of character. Many a man can do good service in the homeland who could not succeed on the foreign field. The duties of a missionary are not like those of a pastor at home, who usually succeeds to an established work, who finds methods already so largely determined that his duty is rather one of modification than of origination, and who has wise counselors in his church officers. The missionary's functions are rather those of a superintendent. He must be a leader and organizer. Mere piety will not make a missionary, any more than mere patriotism will make an ambassador. The boards lay stress on energy, initiative, and self-reliance. They inquire whether the candidate has qualities of leadership and whether, in general, he is a strong man.

Executive Ability

Common sense is a much rarer quality than might be supposed, and not a few candidates go down under the searching inquiries that the boards make regarding it. Some brilliant men lack the balance of judgment, the homely good sense, that are indispensable in a useful missionary. The foreign missionary must deal with a variety of problems and conditions that call for the practical man as distinguished from the visionary. The direction of native helpers, the expenditure of considerable sums of money, the superintendence of building operations, the settlement of the questions that are constantly arising among native Christians, the adjustment to all sorts of persons and conditions—these and other matters that might be mentioned cannot be prudently committed to unbalanced men, however pious or healthy or intellectual. Governor Brown, of Georgia, used to say that “if the Lord has left judgment out of a man, there is no way of getting it in.” The mission field is not the place for the dreamer, the crank, the mere enthusiast. The quality of good sense is so often developed in the school of privation that some of the best missionaries have been men who were forced by poverty to work their own way through college, for the necessity that was thus laid upon them developed those qualities of alertness, self-reliance, and good sense that are of high value in missionary life.

Common Sense

Purpose and Persistence Necessary

The missionary movement is not a spasmodic crusade. It is not an easy life. The romantic halo about it is chiefly in books. It should not be entered upon, therefore, by those who are prone to rapid alternations of feeling, or who are easily discouraged, or who are incapable of persevering toil. The student who has volunteered under the impulse of emotional excitement should give his new purpose a reasonable testing period before making application for appointment. The man who is always conceiving great projects and never carrying them out is another type that is not desired. Most of the boards have had experience with such missionaries and they do not want any more. The man of patient persistence in well-doing, who does not easily lose heart, who courageously and inflexibly sticks to his work, however discouraging it may be, the man who, like General Grant, "proposes to fight it out on this line if it takes all summer," is the type that is wanted for missionary service. Missionary employment is expected to be for life, and no one should apply who is not willing to consecrate himself irrevocably to it, who cannot make light of privations and "endure hardness as a good soldier of Jesus Christ." A veteran missionary, in asking for an associate, wrote: "Send us a despiser of difficulties, who will not be discouraged under the most adverse circumstances, who will unite unflinching courage with consummate tact, know how to do impossible things and maintain a pertinacity that borders on stubbornness with a suavity of manners that softens asperity." That is expecting a good deal of human nature, but it indicates the ideal that we have in mind.

Agreeable Temperament

Ability to work harmoniously with others is a prime qualification. The mission circle is the very worst place in the world for a quarrelsome man or woman. One such missionary will wreck the happiness and perhaps the efficiency of a whole station. No degree of ability or force of character can make a missionary of that type tolerable. Indeed, the stronger he is the more trouble he makes. Then there is the man, or the woman, who takes personal offense when his or her plans are opposed. Most troublesome of all is the type of Christian who is so certain that God has, in answer to prayer, shown him what ought to be done, that he is wholly inaccessible to the arguments of others. It does not occur to him that his associates also pray and that God may guide them as well as him. A vast amount of unregenerate pugnacity and narrow-mindedness in this world passes for "fidelity to the truth as I see it."

Cheerfulness

A cheerful spirit is as essential as ability to work with others. Some otherwise very excellent people are by temperament despondent. They magnify difficulties and imagine them where they do not exist at all. Present to them any proposal, and they will see all the objections to it first. They never weary of bemoaning the shortcomings of their fellow Christians. They walk about Zion and mark the defects thereof and tell them to the public. They remind one of the old Scotch elder, who lugubriously said of his church of three hundred members: "There be nae real Christians here except masel' an' Sandy, an' sometimes I hae ma doots about Sandy." "Good Lord, deliver us!" is the prayer of the missionaries already on the field regarding all these types.

The candidate who holds opinions of doctrine or polity that are not in accord with those of the Church with which he would be associated as a missionary falls under the general head of incompatibility. Variance of this kind may be, and ordinarily is, held from thoroughly praiseworthy motives, and it is not the province of a board to attempt to convince the candidate that he is wrong or to bring any pressure whatever to bear upon him to change his views. It simply notes the fact that the candidate probably could not harmonize with missionaries who hold a different position. This objection would not, of course, apply to those variations of belief that are within the recognized limits of evangelical faith as held by the Church to which the candidate belongs. In no denomination is the ministry entirely homogeneous as to questions of doctrine, nor do the boards insist that the missionary body shall be. There are the same differences of this kind among missionaries that are to be found at home. We are referring now to those questions that would differentiate a candidate from the whole body of his associates and introduce embarrassing complications among them. Hobbies or eccentricities of any kind are considered more or less objectionable as tending to divide those who ought not to be divided and to affect injuriously the influence of the missionary body upon the natives, who are always quick to observe and to comment upon such differences.

Harmonious
Doctrinal Views

Marriage

It is a mistake to suppose that the boards insist upon marriage. Indeed, some boards require their men to go out single, but permit them to marry after learning the language and proving their fitness for missionary life. Other boards advise this course, but leave it to the judgment of the candidate. The objections to deferring marriage do not, as a rule, relate to the work, but come from families on the field, who do not feel prepared to board young men. Traders and Roman Catholic priests usually keep "bachelors' hall," and where a couple of young missionaries are together, there is no valid reason why they cannot do so for a year or two if necessary. No Protestant board advocates the celibacy of missionaries. All appoint married men; but almost all have certain forms of work that can better be done, for a time at least, by single men. A candidate, therefore, who has not already arranged for marriage, need not feel that he is under any pressure to do so. If, after a few years on the field, he wishes to marry, the board will have pleasure in sending his fiancée to him, provided, of course, she is found to possess the necessary qualifications for missionary life. So many missionaries and friends are constantly coming and going, that there is seldom any difficulty in finding suitable companionship for the young ladies on the journey.

The fiancée must make a separate application, and it will be as carefully investigated as that of the man whom she is to marry. No woman should go to the foreign field simply because she is the wife of a missionary. Life in a heathen land is so trying, from the viewpoint of home standards, that the wife who is not in deep spiritual sympathy with her husband's missionary work and purpose will almost certainly become lonely, discontented, and depressed. She may successfully fight against this for a time, but in the end she will not only become unhappy herself, but she will probably make her husband unhappy,

The Acceptable
Fiancée

while it is not improbable that her health will give way and that he will be compelled to give up his life's plans and return home with an invalid wife. Most of the boards have had such costly experiences of this kind that they are disposed to make careful inquiry regarding the qualifications of those who expect to become the wives of missionaries.

Wives of Missionaries

The wives of missionaries are regarded as associate missionaries, uniting with their husbands in desire and effort to give the gospel to the unevangelized. It is expected that, so far as is consistent with their strength and household duties, they will learn the language and take part in missionary work.

Children

So many candidates have to be declined on account of their families that it is proper to add that, while the boards cordially recognize their privilege and duty in relation to children that are born on the field, the boards hesitate where there are children prior to application for appointment. It costs much more to transport such families to the field and more to house them after their arrival. A mother finds it difficult to get the time and strength for language study, and there is always a possibility that such missionaries will have to resign because they find the foreign field unfavorable to the health of their children. Ordinarily, therefore, most boards do not like to appoint candidates who already have children, though they do this in exceptional cases.

It need hardly be said that if any one of the qualifications that have been mentioned is more indispensable than the others, it is spiritual life. No matter how healthy or able or well educated, the successful candidate must have a sound, well-developed Christian character. The boards do not commission mere physicians or school-teachers, but missionaries. The medical graduate who simply wishes to practise his profession in a great mission hospital in Asia, the professor whose ambition is only to build up a flourishing school, the youth who wants to see strange lands and peoples or who is animated by the spirit of adventure, are not wanted. Missionary work in all its forms is distinctly spiritual in spirit and aim. David Livingstone, when asked what were the chief requirements of a successful missionary, gave as the first: "A goodly portion of God's own loving yearnings over the souls of the heathen." The boards, therefore, place great stress on the candidate's spiritual experience and his motives for seeking missionary service. The missionary should be above everything else a spiritual guide. Inquiries on this point are carefully made, and if there is reason to doubt the spiritual influence of a candidate, he is certain to be declined.

Other Desirable Qualities

Other considerations may emerge in particular cases. Some experience in teaching or Christian work, and a knowledge of music in women candidates and of bookkeeping in men, while not usually required, add to the attractiveness of an application. The qualifications that have been mentioned, however, are those that are generally sought for by the boards. Taken together in this way they may appear to constitute a formidable list; but this enumeration should not ease the conscience of any young man or woman who is considering the question of going to the foreign field.

Encouragement to Applicants

Ill health, imperfect education, dependent relatives, inability to work harmoniously with others, and age that forbids hope of acquiring a difficult language are valid reasons for not applying; but unless some such positive disqualification is known to exist, the proper course is to correspond with the secretary of the board and he will gladly give all needed counsel. A general sense of unfitness for so noble a calling is not an adequate reason for failure to apply. Such modesty is apt to be the refuge of those who are quite willing to have an excuse to stay at home. One should not be deterred because of reports that men are being rejected for want of funds or for any other reason. The financial situation may have changed, or an unexpected vacancy may have occurred. The fact that an apparently good man of one's acquaintance has been declined is not necessarily a reason for discouragement, for the board may have discovered some defect that his friends did not suspect, or the trouble may have been with his fiancée. No matter what one hears, if he feels that he ought to go to the foreign field, he should send in his application and place upon the board the responsibility of dealing with it.

There is no disgrace in being rejected, for it will readily be seen that a number of the reasons mentioned above may be providential in character, and, while hindering one's going to the foreign field, might not hinder a successful life for Christ in the homeland. Moreover, the boards consider all applications as confidential, so that the fact of rejection need not be known beyond the limited circle of the friends whose private opinions it is necessary for the board to seek.

The procedure in making application is simple—write to the General Secretary of the Board for a set of application blanks and all needful information. The secretary, on receiving the formal application, corresponds with

Proper View of Rejection

Procedure in Making Application

those who know the candidate. Some boards have a printed list of questions for this purpose, as they have learned from experience that, while most people will tell the truth, they will not tell all the truth unless definite questions are asked and a specific answer insisted upon. The time required for this investigation is ordinarily about two or three months, though in special cases it may vary.

Conference at Headquarters

As a further precaution, a few of the boards have adopted the plan of bringing newly appointed missionaries to their headquarters for a conference of a week or ten days. These conferences have proved to be of great interest and value, enabling the secretaries to pass the appointees in careful review before going to the field, establishing at the outset relations of personal friendship, acquainting the new missionary with some of the lessons of missionary experience and the main features of missionary policy, and clarifying his opinions on a number of important matters.

Missionary Call

How may one know whether he is called of God to be a missionary? The divine summons is made known in a variety of ways. Some men are conscious of a call almost as distinct and commanding as that of the Apostle Paul. Probably few have such an experience, and the lack of it should not be regarded as an indication that one has no call to missionary service. God's will is often made known in quieter ways. Many theological students make the mistake of assuming that the absence of an external peremptory call means that they should stay at home. The result is that scores look for home pastorates because they "have no call to go abroad." The assumption should be just the reverse. If God calls a man to preach the gospel at all, surely the presumption is in favor of the field where the work is the greatest and the workers are fewest. With an average of one minister for every 514 people at home and candidates thronging every vacant pulpit, while abroad there is an average of but one for every 174,000 of the population; with all the doors of opportunity wide open and the mission boards vainly appealing for more men—it is preposterous for the average student to assume that he should stay in America unless a voice from heaven summons him to go to the needy millions of Asia or Africa. In the language of Keith-Falconer: "While vast continents are shrouded in almost utter darkness, and hundreds of millions suffer the horrors of heathenism or of Islam, the burden of proof lies upon you to show that the circumstances in which God has placed you were meant by him to keep you out of the foreign mission field."

Question
of Need

The plea that there are needs at home is mere quibbling, in view not only of the facts already stated, but of the further fact that about ninety-eight out of every hundred students are staying at home. It is probably fair to say of any given student that there is no need of him in the home field that is at all commensurate with the need of him on the foreign field. His proper attitude therefore should not be, "Why should I go as a foreign missionary?" but "Why should I not go?" The late James Gilmour, the famous itinerant missionary to the Mongol tribes, wrote of this period in his student life: "Even on the low ground of common sense I seemed to be called to be a missionary. Is the kingdom a harvest field? Then I thought it reasonable that I should seek the work where the work was most abundant and the workers fewest." "This was the plain common-sense process by which that apostle to Mongolia reached a decision as to duty."

QUESTIONS ON CHAPTER III<sup>1</sup>

AIM: TO UNDERSTAND WHAT SORT OF PERSONS ARE NEEDED FOR FOREIGN MISSIONARY WORK AND HOW THEY ARE APPOINTED

1. Make out a list of questions which you think a board should submit to missionary candidates on the subject of physical qualifications.
2. What answers to these questions would you accept as satisfactory?
3. Make out a list of questions on the subject of educational and mental qualifications, and indicate satisfactory answers.
4. Make out a list on the subject of personal character and ability, and indicate satisfactory answers.
5. Make out a list on the subject of spiritual qualifications, with satisfactory answers.
6. To what persons, besides the candidate, would you apply for information on these topics?
7. What questions would you put to these others that you would not put to the candidate?
8. Under which head would you consider it most important to have strongly favorable testimony?
9. Under which head would you be most prepared to accept testimony not altogether favorable?
10. Would you accept a candidate who was not a successful missionary at home?

---

<sup>1</sup>Churchmen desiring to know the requirements of candidates for the foreign field should write the General Secretary of the Domestic and Foreign Missionary Society, 281 Fourth Avenue, New York City.

92 Why and How of Foreign Missions

11. What sort of courses would you advise a college freshman to take in preparation for the foreign field?
12. What special work would you recommend for a theological student?
13. What special work, for a medical student?
14. What sort of training would you advise for a young woman volunteer sixteen years of age during the time that must intervene before she went to the field?
15. Whose fault is it that the average ability of missionaries is not higher?
16. What besides personal qualifications might lead an application to be accepted at one time and rejected at another?
17. What advantage is it for a board to have more candidates than it can send out?
18. What percentage of persons in the United States do you think have the necessary physical qualifications for foreign missionary service?
19. What percentage have the necessary mental and educational qualifications?
20. What percentage have the necessary qualifications as to character and ability?
21. What percentage have the necessary spiritual qualifications?
22. What percentage possess all these qualifications in the required degree?
23. What measure of responsibility do you think rests upon this last-named class?

24. Name what you consider to be valid reasons for those well qualified for the foreign field to remain at home.
25. What constitutes a call to the foreign field?
26. Should those qualified assume that they ought to stay at home unless they have a special call to go abroad or that they ought to go unless they have a special call to stay?
27. What proportion of those who ought to go abroad do you think actually do go?
28. What measures can you suggest for securing the volunteers that are needed and that ought to respond?
29. What would you tell a person who suspected he was called to the foreign field but who was not yet willing to make a decision?
30. What would you tell a person who was willing to go but who seemed hardly to possess the proper qualifications?
31. What responsibilities rest on those not qualified to go abroad or hindered for valid reasons?
32. How much compared with those who go to the field ought they to be willing to sacrifice for the cause?

THE FINANCIAL SUPPORT OF THE MISSIONARY ENTERPRISE

The Church ought to regard the provision of ample funds for the prosecution of its great campaign as a matter of course, as its most elementary duty. But it should give much more than subscriptions and collections. It should give keen and eager interest, unflinching sympathy, intelligent and fervent prayer. That is "support of missions."
—Eugene Stock

If it were possible to secure a general consensus of judgment from a large number of people as to how a missionary ought to live in order to exert the most profound and permanent influence over the people to whom he is sent, there would probably be practical unanimity in the conclusion that he ought not to live in what is called "luxury," even if such privileges were to be provided by the missionary society that supports him. . . . There are many who have formed in their minds a conception of the missionary living rudely, without any of the common comforts of life, enduring the severest hardships and perils amid most forbidding surroundings. This conception has become so thoroughly fixed in the minds of many good Christians in civilized countries, that it is something of a shock to them to know that the missionary ordinarily lives in a comfortable house with a good roof over his head, and a comfortable bed to sleep upon at night, and that he has daily sufficient food for the proper nourishment of his body.
—James L. Barton

IV

THE FINANCIAL SUPPORT OF THE MISSIONARY ENTERPRISE

THIS is a subject that interests the layman who gives as well as the student who volunteers. There is special reason for discussing it, because it is often misunderstood.

A Subject Often Misunderstood

It should be borne in mind at the outset that the principle is support rather than compensation. Inquiry is made as to the cost of a reasonably comfortable living, and a sum is assigned that covers that cost. The amount varies in different fields, as the cost of living varies. A married man gets more than a single man, because two are to be supported instead of one. The birth of a child brings a small additional allowance, usually $100 a year, because it means an increased expenditure. This is sometimes criticised, but any parent in the United States can give a critic valuable information as to whether a child can be fed, clothed, and educated on $100 a year.

Support Rather than Compensation

Most of the boards make a flat rate for all the missionaries of a given region, paying the same amount to the new recruit as to the veteran. Other boards grade salaries according to length of service, paying a minimum amount for the first term, a little larger sum for the second term, and a still larger one for the third. This plan is growing in favor, as it recognizes the fact that expenses increase with enlarging work and family; but no distinction is ever made on the ground of relative ability or responsibility. The most famous preacher, the president of a great university, and the superintendent of the largest hospital, receive precisely the same salary as the humblest member of the mission. Clergymen, educators, and physicians are all paid the same salaries. Single men usually receive a little more than single women, not because they are considered as worth more, but because it costs them more to live, as they more often require separate establishments, while single women can usually live with some family or in a school.

Salaries Equalized

The Average Salary

It will be seen that it is not possible to state any particular figure that would apply to all fields. The salary varies with length of service from $750 to $1,100 for a single missionary and $1,250 to $1,750 for a married one. This is not designed to cover house accommodations, which are provided in addition.

A Barely Adequate Scale

The scale of support is intended to be adequate to the needs of a Christian worker who is not luxurious in his tastes, and the promised sum is promptly paid. It covers, however, only reasonable needs, and while ministers in this country may look forward to an increase, sometimes to large figures, the most eminent foreign missionary expects only modest support to the day of his death. Other foreigners in non-christian lands are paid far more liberally than missionaries. It is as true now as when Macaulay wrote, that "all English labor in India, from the labor of the governor-general and the commander-in-chief down to that of a groom or a watch-maker, must be paid for at a higher rate than at home. No man will be banished, and banished to the torrid zone, for nothing."

Business men, who have commercial dealings with Asia and Africa, say that they have to pay three times the salaries that are paid in America, in order to induce their clerks and agents to stay abroad. One of the latter is reported to have said that he "would rather hang on to a lamp-post in the United States than to have an estate and a palace amid the heat and dust and snakes and dirt and fevers and fleas of a typical Oriental country." Such discomforts do not characterize all mission lands, but they do characterize many of them. The fact that some restless adventurers prefer an African jungle or an Asiatic port does

Secular Workers
by Contrast

not invalidate the statement that the average man will not live amid such conditions unless he is tempted by the hope of rich gains. But missionaries like Bishop Brent, Bishop Kingsolving and the Rev. Dr. W. C. Brown, of Brazil, the late Bishops Ingle and Schereschewsky, educators like the Rev. Dr. F. L. H. Pott, and physicians like Dr. W. H. Boone, and dozens of other distinguished missionaries, who could have commanded large salaries at home, have only received the ordinary missionary stipend. Dr. Boone, for example, gave up a practise yielding thousands of dollars a year to become a missionary at a salary of as many hundreds.

No Local Resources

Nor has the missionary the local resources of the home missionary. He cannot accept money from native Christians for his personal use without exposing himself to the charge of mercenary motives in coming among them. It is hard enough at best for them to understand his disinterestedness. He must be able to say: "I seek not yours, but you." Therefore if he earns money, he turns it over to the board, so careful is he to avoid even the appearance of self-seeking.

Prices of Supplies Abroad

It is misleading to say that "a dollar will go further in a heathen land than in America." It may, perhaps, in the purchase of some native supplies, but not in the articles which Europeans and Americans deem necessary. The average mission land does not produce the kinds of food and clothing that a white man has to use, and the missionary must usually buy in the homeland, paying the same price that the average American at home pays and, in addition, the cost of freight across a continent or an ocean, usually both. True, he can sometimes purchase a part of his supplies at a local store at exorbitant prices; but as a rule he finds it cheaper to buy his food and clothing in London, New York, or Chicago.

The change in economic conditions in recent years has seriously affected the missionary. The cost of living has risen as rapidly on the foreign field as at home, but the salaries have risen very little or not at all. A committee of the Laos Mission writes: "The cost of vegetables, fruit, chickens, eggs, fuel, and coolie hire has doubled, and in some cases trebled, within the past twelve years. There has also been a constant advance in the prices of meat and milk. We do not mention such luxuries as Irish potatoes, which sell at $24 per bushel (too dear for a missionary's purse); nor ham, which sells at sixty cents per pound."

This upward movement is spreading all over the world. A missionary in South America writes: "Multiply American prices of shoes

Increasing Cost of Living

Scale in South America

by two and a half, clothing by two, cheap cloth by three, underclothes by four, hats by three, and you will have the prices of the same qualities of the same articles here."

Calls Upon Missionaries
to Give

It should be borne in mind, too, that the missionary has many calls upon his charity. Rectors of large city churches know how numerous such calls are at home. But there is probably no other Christian worker in the world upon whom they press so heavily as the foreign missionary. He is among multitudes of poverty-stricken people. There are no charitable agencies, as at home, to which they can be referred, nor are there well-to-do laymen who can help in bearing the burden. The sick and starving are continually appealing to him. Moreover, as he organizes the converts into churches, he wishes to impress upon them the duty of giving as a Christian grace, and in order to make his teaching effective, he must set the example. We do not know of any missionary who gives less than one tenth of his salary in these ways, and many give a much larger proportion. If Christians at home would give as liberally as missionaries, the whole enterprise would be far more generously supported.

An Absurd
Criticism

In the light of these facts, the absurdity of the criticism that "missionaries live in luxury"

will readily be seen. Missionaries who can "live in luxury" in such circumstances must be remarkable financiers. The fact is that the missionary is seldom able to save anything, and if he breaks down, he becomes dependent.

Globe-trotters who have eagerly accepted missionary hospitality have sometimes been guilty of base ingratitude in their accounts of it. Oppressed by their loneliness and hungry for tidings from the homeland, the missionary and his wife heartily welcome the visitor and, in honor of the occasion, bring out their little household treasures, put on their best clothes, and prepare a dinner far better than they ordinarily have or than they can really afford. Then the guest goes away to prate about the extravagance of missionaries. A friend once gave Mrs. Hepburn of Japan a large turkey, a costly gift in Japan. That very day, an American traveler called with a letter of introduction. She invited him to dinner, and he wrote home, and his statement was printed in several newspapers, that the most expensive meal he had eaten in his tour around the world was at the table of a foreign missionary!

"But I hear that a certain missionary keeps four servants while I can afford but one!" cries a wife in America. Allow us to suggest

Unjust Statements

The Servant
Question

some considerations which may not have occurred to this wife.

Native
Methods
Unavoidable

First, her one servant doing general house-work means as much help as four servants mean in a heathen land. A cook in India will do nothing but cook; a sweeper nothing but sweep; a water-drawer nothing but draw water; and so on through the whole list, each one, moreover, performing his task in a spirit the reverse of strenuous. A cook would die rather than touch a broom, for he would break his caste. "If," writes a missionary wife, "my own pleasure were consulted, I would certainly prefer working in my own home to visiting dirty homes infested with vermin and offensive odors. It seems a little strange that the missionary who pays her servants out of her own salary is so much blamed for what she would gladly help if she could."

Our Municipal Arrangements
Aid Us

Second, consider, too, that at home we all have many assistants whose services we fail to take into account in comparing ourselves with foreign missionaries. The mail-carrier delivers our mail without cost to us; but the missionary usually has to hire some one to get his mail from the post-office, which is probably miles away. We can travel on a street-car or a railway train; but the missionary must employ coolies to carry him in a chair or wheel him in a barrow or row him in a boat to his preaching appointments in outlying villages. The city policeman patrols our street; but the foreigner in Asia and Africa must engage a watchman or have all his belongings stolen. The grocer calls at our house for orders and delivers the goods; but the missionary must have a native to do his marketing, as in many cases the native shopkeepers will ask a foreigner several times what they would ask their own people, and will come down to a reasonable figure only after hours of wearisome haggling; for time is no object to an Oriental. Our complex and highly developed civilization in Europe and America enables the average man to avail himself daily of the labors of scores of others. The missionary, living in more primitive conditions, must hire servants, or neglect his work and spend the greater part of his time doing things himself that natives can do just as well and at smaller cost.

Third, the foreign missionary, living as he does in lands where hotels are few and vile and where Oriental ideas of hospitality prevail, is forced to keep open house for all comers. The occasional traveler and the constantly passing and repassing missionaries of his own and other churches must be freely entertained. The natives, too, call in appalling numbers. The host, like Abraham of old, must hasten to set meat and drink before every guest, for failure to do so would be deemed a breach of hospitality and an offense which would probably end the missionary's influence. A missionary's wife in Syria says that she often had twenty to meals and a hundred callers in a single day, all of whom had to be served with cakes and coffee or lemonade. Another in China had 4,580 women visitors in one year, besides men and children. Tea had to be provided for all that host.

Open House
Must be Kept

Higher Claims
Upon Mission
Workers

Fourth, would it be common sense to send an educated Christian woman as a foreign missionary, and then force her to spend her time in cooking meals and washing dishes, when she can hire native servants who are glad to do that work for a few cents a day? Julian Ralph, writing from Asia on this subject, says: "I demand that the missionaries keep servants. They are paid to give their time to missionary work, and, especially in the case of a wife and mother, I claim she has no right to do housework, sewing, and similar work and give only her leisure from such things to that service for which she has a regular salary."

Living "As the Natives Do"

Some people innocently ask, "Why don't missionaries live as the natives do?" Such people probably do not know how the natives live. An African fastens a yard of calico around his waist, ties a string of beads about his neck, and fancies himself dressed for all occasions. Bare-headed, bare-chested, and bare-footed, he exposes himself to the fierce rays of the tropical sun, and when night comes, with its chill air and drenching dew, he sleeps upon the ground. An American doing that would be smitten with African fever within twenty-four hours. A Chinese lives contentedly and works hard on a handful of rice a day, and in a dark, unventilated room, not much larger than the kennel in which the reader keeps his dog. Would the critic live that way? Could he? A typical heathen woman does all the drudgery of the household, collects fuel, tills the fields, and secures and prepares the food. Do the critics at home want their wives to do such work? Burmese children run around naked until they are about ten years of age. Would we allow our children to do so?

Live as a heathen does? The heathen does not live. The death-rate of heathenism is appalling. The men die of consumption and pneumonia and fevers and cholera and small-pox. The children are carried off in regiments by diphtheria and measles and scarlet fever and cholera infantum; while as for the women, at the age of forty, when the English and American woman is in the full splendor

Results a Sufficient Argument

of her beauty, the typical heathen woman is old and withered.

An Experiment

If any critic really imagines that he could live as the heathen live, let him try it. Let him build a hut in his back yard—no floor but the beaten earth, no windows but latticed or paper-covered openings, no bed but a hard platform, no stove but an open fire in the middle of the room, no chimney but a hole in the roof through which the smoke rises and the wind and rain and snow fall, and no fuel but manure mixed with grass, made into cakes by his wife or daughter and dried in the sun. For food, let him buy three bushels of corn. It will sustain life for several weeks and cost but a dollar. Have the wife pound it between two stones, mix it with water, and bake it in the ashes. Then let him eat corn for breakfast and corn for dinner and corn for supper, and the next day eat corn for breakfast and corn for dinner and corn for supper, and before many days have passed, even the most obtuse critic will know why the foreign missionary does not and cannot live as the natives do.

Disastrous Economy

No, the boards are not going to ask foreign missionaries to live as the natives do. The missionary is a civilized man and he needs some things that the uncivilized man does without. Making all due allowance for exceptional places, it still remains true that the average foreign missionary lives and works under a strain which few at home realize, and it would be folly to compel him to adopt a mode of life that would wreck his constitution in a few years. Common sense dictates that, having incurred the expense of sending him out, he should be so equipped that he may be able to do the work for which he was sent. The disastrous experience of the American army in Cuba taught the government that it is poor policy to economize in the support of soldiers. A division of invalids is worth little in a campaign. Shall the Church be less wise in taking reasonable care of its men?

We grant that there are richer natives who live on a much better scale; but their expenditures are so great that a missionary could not possibly equal them. The Chinese mandarin and the East Indian noble often spend money lavishly; but even then, their ideas of comfort differ so widely from ours that their homes could scarcely be deemed ideal by the average American. Thousands of young men in England have pleasanter bedrooms than the Emperor of China, and the average mechanic in the United States has a more comfortably warmed house than a samurai of Japan, in spite of the costly furs that lie on his floor and the elaborate carvings that adorn his room. The food and general manner of life of the wealthier classes in Asia would quickly undermine the health of a European or American.

A Different
Standard

Proper Means
Not to Be Disregarded

It is said that the missionaries of certain independent organizations are not maintained as are the missionaries of the denominational boards. This is an error, so far as the best of these societies are concerned. The actual salary may be smaller, but there are allowances that the denominational boards do not make, so that the net result to the missionary is practically the same. There are, however, independent societies of which the statement is true; but the frequent result is suffering that ought to have been avoided, or else, as one missionary writes, "The independent missionary cultivates friendly relations with some neighboring board missionary; his calls, by a singular coincidence, usually happening about meal-time." A disregard of means that God has provided is neither religion nor business. The Christian at home has no right to demand all the good things of life for himself—comfortable house, abundant food, adequate clothing—and then insist that his personal representative in preaching the gospel abroad shall be half-starved. If it is a Christian's duty to live like a tramp without visible means of support, let the home rector and layman set the example. It is easier to do it here than in a heathen land and less dangerous to health.

It should be remembered, too, that the missionary represents not only a superior religion but, in some lands at least, the more decent style of living which has resulted from that religion. It is, though a subordinate, yet a real part of his mission to exemplify this. His better house and mode of living are themselves an object-lesson of the uplifting influence of Christianity. He would be untrue to his faith if he abdicated the function of a Christian gentleman and lived like a barbarian. He goes out to bring the heathen up to his level, not to go down to theirs.

The Missionary
Home an Object-lesson

Nor would personal degradation be more likely to win the natives to Christianity. Dr. John Forman, of India, made a persistent effort to live like the natives. He rented a small room, wore cheap clothes, and ate the simplest food. He writes: "What I had longed for was to get near the people, to convince them that I really was working only for their salvation and that I was denying myself for them. I was never more thoroughly earnest about anything I undertook, and never have I felt that I made a more dismal failure. Everything turned out just as I had not expected. They seemed to regard me as nothing but poor white trash. The idea that I had voluntarily given up anything or was denying myself never occurred to them. I was still the same government official, only had not succeeded in getting a very remunerative position. I had less influence instead of more. I met with a great deal of opposition, a vast amount of ridicule, and had no end of yelling, hooting, and hand-clapping from the small boys, but my success seemed to end there."

A Useless
Sacrifice

Different Modes of Living

The fact is that an American simply cannot equal an East Indian fakir in his mode of living. The latter sprinkles himself with ashes, begs his frugal meals, wears nothing but a loin-cloth, subjects himself to frightful austerities, performs his devotions in public places, and never washes himself. The plainest living possible to a foreigner impresses the natives as luxurious in comparison with their own devotees, and therefore has absolutely no good effect upon them.

Mission Efforts Wrecked by Wrong Theories

Some missionaries, who do not believe in boards or fixed salaries, have gone out independently, with the intention of supporting themselves by teaching or some other kind of work, or of subsisting on the direct spontaneous gifts of individuals or local churches at home. The results have usually been disastrous. Dr. Lawrence said that it seemed to him "that India was literary strewn with the wrecks of mission work begun by such independent missionaries, but for one reason and another abandoned. Much the same is proving true of Africa."

A missionary who has no means of his own cannot live in Asia or Africa without a salary. He cannot reasonably expect the poverty-stricken natives to support him. If he supports himself, he must toil in a way that will undermine his health, secularize his life, and probably expose him to the charge of mercenary motives. If he depends upon a salary from home, a board is the best agency for its collection and payment. A missionary once declined to receive further salary from his board on the ground that the Holy Spirit had directed him "to trust the Lord to support him by the voluntary gifts of his people." Such a request indicates a confusion of ideas. Does not the Lord provide money that his people send through a board? It is not a question whether a missionary shall receive money for his support; it is whether he shall receive it in the orderly way that the people of God, led by his Spirit, have instituted. A Christian worker who refuses a salary either receives a larger sum than he ought to have, with the attendant injustice to givers and waste of the Lord's money, or he receives less than he ought to get, with the attendant

A Mission Board the Best Agency

injury to his own health and wrong to those who are dependent upon him. When Mr. Moody conducted a series of meetings in a certain city, he agreed to a definite payment for his services, and all believed him to be both pious and sensible. Another evangelist, a year or two later, refused to enter into any financial compact or to allow any collections or subscription papers, stating that he would take only what the Spirit of God prompted the people to give. The result was not only embarrassment for the committee in charge, but, in the end, a considerably larger sum than he ought to have had.

A Sensible View

It appears reasonable to insist that if a missionary ought to go to the foreign field at all, the home Church ought to send him and maintain him, unless he has a personal income that suffices for his wants, and that gifts for his support should be sent through the established agency of the Church to which he belongs. Faith and piety are consistent with common sense.

Regular Salary Payments

The question has often been mooted whether a board, instead of guaranteeing the missionary a fixed salary, should not simply send him his proportion of whatever sum it may receive. But the receipts of all the boards come in very irregularly and seldom equal expenditures for the first eight months of a fiscal year. If a board simply distributed receipts as they came in, the missionaries would not have enough to live upon for two thirds of the year. They would suffer for the necessaries of life, or they would have to run up debts that would seriously compromise their missionary reputation.

The plan impresses us as visionary and un-businesslike. No sensible layman would dream of conducting his business on any such basis. Nor should we expect grocers and butchers and clothiers of heathen or Christian lands to supply missionaries with the necessaries of life, with the understanding that they will be paid for, if the Lord moves his people to provide the funds. If that scheme is a good one, why should it not be made equally applicable to ministers at home? There is no valid reason why it should be confined to the foreign missionaries. We believe that the only sound principle, both in faith and in business, is that the Church should, through a duly constituted board, assume responsibility for the support of the missionaries that it sends out. When God calls men to go, he calls his people to send. If there is financial risk to be taken, the Church should take it. It is neither fair nor Christian to unload its proper responsibilities upon the already over-burdened missionaries.

The Church
Must Carry the Risk

Houses of Missionaries
Not Too
Luxurious

Information about the houses of missionaries is frequently desired, especially by those who have been disturbed by statements that they are equal to the houses of native noblemen. A similar statement might be made about the houses of many American mechanics. We do not deny that the missionary's dwelling often appears palatial in comparison with the wretched hovels in which the natives herd like rabbits in a warren. Shattered health and rapidly filled cemeteries have taught missionaries that, if they are to live, they must go a little apart from the malodorous, insanitary, human pigsty, with its rotting garbage and open cesspools, select a site high enough to afford natural drainage, and build a house with a sufficient number of cubic feet of space for the persons who are to occupy it. Then the natural taste of the husband leads him to make a little lawn and to set out a few shrubs and flowers, while indoors his wife sensibly makes everything as cozy and attractive as she can with the means at her disposal. As it is supposed to be a home for life, articles by gift and purchase are gradually accumulated, and it really becomes a pretty place in time. Contrasting as it does with the miserable habitations of a heathen city, it attracts attention; but its attractiveness is not due to the lavish expenditure of money, but to the good taste and inventiveness of a cultivated, intelligent family.

The visitor approaching Fusan, Korea, is apt to remark upon the buildings that stand conspicuously upon the hill, and to hear a sneer about the selfishness and ostentation of missionaries in selecting the best sites. The facts are that when the missionaries went to Fusan, they could not afford to buy in the city, and they took the hill site because it was unoccupied and cheap, paying just $75 for the whole tract on which church, hospital, and residences now stand. The owner was glad to get that price, as the land was then practically valueless. That time has proved it to be the best site in Fusan, and that the mission occupation of it led others to seek the neighborhood so that the place is now valuable, is simply a tribute to the good judgment of the missionaries.

Missionary Good Fortune
in Fusan

Another illustration occurred in Persia, where the missionaries were accused of having for a summer resort at Lake Urumia "one of the finest palaces in all the land." The "palace" referred to was an old, abandoned one-story and basement mud building, which the owner was delighted to sell to the missionaries for $80. They fixed it up as best they could with a private gift of $170 from a kind-hearted lady in St. Louis, and then the several missionary families of Urumia took turns in occupying it for a few weeks during the heated term.

A Persian
"Palace"

Average Cost of Missionary Residences

A few missionary residences in different lands have been built by wealthy relatives for particular missionaries, and occasionally one is built as a memorial for a deceased friend. But the average missionary residence costs from $2,500 to $3,000, including land. Building in most fields is quite as expensive as at home. Indeed lumber, glass, and hardware can often be imported from England or America cheaper than they can be bought on the field. Many missionary houses in China and Korea contain Oregon lumber, Pittsburg windows, and Birmingham metals. The reader can therefore judge for himself how palatial such a place must be. The average missionary residence is about like the home of a country clergyman or school-teacher in England and America; though in the tropics, the fertility of the soil, the luxuriance of palms and foliage-plants, and the cheapness of labor make it easier for the missionary to have beautiful grounds.

QUESTIONS ON CHAPTER IV

AIM: TO UNDERSTAND WHY MISSIONARIES RECEIVE THE SALARIES THEY DO

1. In the Society of Friends, the ministers receive no salaries. What are the advantages of this arrangement?
2. What are the principal arguments against it?
3. If the ministry is to be salaried, what principles should determine the amount each individual is to receive?
4. How ought the homes of ministers to compare with those of their congregations?
5. What possible abuses of the system should be guarded against?
6. Is a congregation which desires an able man justified in offering an "attractive" salary?
7. To what extent should the principles which govern the support of ministers at home apply to missionaries on the foreign field?
8. What arguments can you give for paying missionaries smaller salaries than the average home minister?
9. What arguments can you give for paying them larger salaries?
10. What likelihood is there that any one would become a foreign missionary from sordid motives?
11. Name the principal sacrifices that a missionary is called upon to make.

120 Why and How of Foreign Missions

12. What salary would compensate you for these sacrifices if you had no heart interest in the work?
13. What would you judge as to the relative attractiveness of the ministry at home and on the foreign field from the relative numbers in each calling?
14. What percentage of the missionary force do you think would have received larger salaries if they had remained at home?
15. In what degree of "luxury" ought a missionary to live?
16. What are the arguments for and against as attractive a Western home as his salary permits?
17. Would it be true economy for the missionary's wife to have no servants and do her own housework?
18. In what expense is the board involved when a missionary breaks down?
19. How long would it be before a new volunteer would equal a retiring missionary in efficiency?
20. From a business standpoint what is the relative importance of care of health by a missionary and a home minister?
21. Do you think that critics would really remain satisfied if missionaries lived as the natives do?
22. What are the arguments for and against self-support by missionaries?

23. Would it ordinarily take more or less time for an American to earn his support in this country than in China?
24. How much longer would it take to build up a strong native church if the missionaries gave only the time not required for self-support to the work?
25. Would the missionary force be increased in efficiency if the policy of self-supporting missionaries were adopted?
26. What is there in the case of the Apostle Paul that is not parallel?
27. Is the Christian Church really too poor to provide a support for missionaries?
28. Where does the responsibility rest for seeing that the missionary enterprise is properly financed?
29. What money do you think you have invested more economically and profitably than that which you have given to foreign missions?

THE MISSIONARY AT WORK

The practical value of educational missions may be inferred from an incident in the work of certain missionaries in the interior of Africa. They gave themselves wholly to evangelistic work without any effort at education, under the mistaken idea that proclaiming the gospel to those who had not heard it was the beginning and the end of missionary endeavor. After years of faithful preaching, the gospels were translated into the native language, when it was discovered that none could read!
—Wilson S. Naylor

In some missions the evangelistic agency has been overshadowed by some other department of activity. While the importance of the other agencies must not be minimized, the neglect of presenting the gospel would be disastrous to the whole missionary enterprise. Among the people every effort must be made to heal their physical ills, to care for them in distress, to teach them the means of obtaining an honest living, to raise up an intelligent and efficient leadership, yet it must be borne in mind that the dominating purpose of missions is to make Christ preëminent in the lives of the millions. If any department may be magnified it is the evangelistic, but unquestionably the wiser plan is to have all these vital agencies permeated with the spirit of winning the allegiance of the people to the Master.

—James M. Thoburn

V

THE MISSIONARY AT WORK

THE variety and scope of the foreign missionary's work are in sharp contrast with the work of the minister at home. The latter hardly realizes to what an extent his efforts are reinforced by the results of centuries of religious teaching. These helps do not exist in most non-christian lands, and therefore the missionary must create them. He must found not only churches, but schools, hospitals, printing-presses, kindergartens, orphanages, and the various other kinds of Christian and benevolent work carried on in this country. He must train up a native ministry, erect buildings, translate and print books and tracts and catechisms. The gospel must be so presented as to touch the lives of men at many points, and they must be helped in making the adaptation to new conditions. In some lands, the missionary must even teach the men how to make clothing, to build houses, and to cultivate the soil; while his wife must show the women how to sew and to cook, to care for children and to make a decent home.

A Missionary's
Work

Intensity and Wide Range

The phrase "missionary at work" is therefore not a misnomer. Those who imagine that "missionaries have an easy time" little realize the heavy and persistent toil that is involved in missionary effort. Foreign missionaries are among the hardest worked men in the world. Much of this work, too, is done in unfavorable climates and amid conditions that tell heavily upon the strength and nerves. The typical hospital, with work enough for two or three physicians, has but one medical missionary, and he must perform every operation and attend every sick patient, save for such native assistants as he may be able to snatch a little time to train. Schools, which at home would have a half dozen or more teachers, have but one or two. The ordained missionary often finds himself obliged to unite the adaptability of a jack-of-all-trades to the functions of an archbishop.

Four Main Lines

The ordinary work of the foreign missionary is along four main lines. Probably the first impression of the traveler is of the

*Educational WorkThe Appeal of the Children

This is partly because it is represented by institutions that are more conspicuous, partly because children are much in evidence in a typical heathen city. They are sweet-faced, bright-eyed children, to whom one is instinctively drawn. One hears the patter of their wooden sandals in the streets of Japan. He sees their quaintly grave faces in the rice-fields of China. He never wearies of watching their brown, chubby little bodies on the river banks of Siam. His heart aches as he sees their emaciated limbs and wan looks in India. Everywhere their features are so expressive, that he feels that they ought to have a better chance in life and that he ought to help them to get it, while new meaning irradiates the words: "It is not the will of your Father . . . that one of these little ones should perish."

In this spirit, one of the first and most loving duties of the missionary is to gather these children into schools and to teach them for this life and the life to come. Day-schools of primary grade are, of course, the most numerous and they reach myriads of little ones. Above them are the boarding-schools, where children are under the continuous care of the missionary. If he be a benefactor of the race who makes two blades of grass grow where one grew before, what shall be said of the missionary who takes a half-naked urchin out of the squalor of a mud hut, where both sexes and all ages herd like pigs, teaches him to bathe himself, to respect woman, to tell the truth, to earn an honest living, and to serve

Schools and Their Beneficent Service

God. It means even more for the girls than for the boys, for heathenism, which venerates animals, despises women. In sacred Benares, India, I saw a man make reverent way for a cow, and a little farther on roughly push a woman out of his path. I saw monkeys in the protected luxury of a temple, while at its gates starving girls begged for bread. Is there any work more Christlike than the gathering of these neglected ones into clean dormitories and showing them the meaning of virtue, of industry, and of that which does not exist throughout all the pagan world, except where the gospel has made it, a pure, sweet Christian home?

Higher Schools

Colleges and normal, medical, and theological schools take the more promising graduates of the boarding-schools and train them for special work among their own people. The equipment of these institutions is often very humble as compared with the magnificent buildings of many of our home colleges; but we may safely challenge Europe and America to show colleges which have achieved more solid results with such limited resources. Many a mission college turns out well-trained men on an income that would hardly keep a home university in lights and fuel.

Enormous Influence

These schools and colleges are exerting an enormous influence. They lead many students to Christ. They undermine the superstitions and dispel the prejudices of many who are not immediately converted. They give the missionary access to new villages and zenanas and familiarize the heathen mind with Christian conceptions. They often form the most effective means of reaching the upper classes. Scores of mission schools are educating the sons and daughters of officials, noblemen, and in some countries, of royal princes.

An interesting illustration of the opportunities thus created occurred in Bangkok, Siam. A nobleman, whom the missionary had vainly tried to lead to Christ, sent his only son to the Christian Boys' High School. A year or two later, in an epidemic of cholera, the boy died. The missionary gently told the stricken parents of the Good Shepherd, who sometimes took a lamb in his arms to induce the sheep to follow him. Deeply moved, the father sketched an outline of the incident and bade an artist paint it. He showed us the picture: a shepherd, with a kindly face, carrying a lamb in his bosom, while afar off two sheep, which had been walking away, were turning with wistful eyes to follow their loved one. "Now," said the nobleman, "I want to give 10,000 ticals to build a church in recognition of God's dealings with me through my boy." And we said: It is as true now as of old that "a little child shall lead them."

Led by a Child

130 Why and How of Foreign Missions

Uncompromisingly Christian

All mission schools are uncompromisingly Christian. The Bible is the chief text-book. Jesus is the great Teacher. Prayer is the atmosphere. Japan tested missionary fidelity to this position. All avenues of preferment lead from the schools which have government recognition. The mission schools were thus recognized; but one day, the Minister of State for Education issued an order forbidding any religious instruction in schools approved by the government. The missionaries had to choose that day whom they would serve. Severance from the government system of education meant that students would be, in effect, debarred from the university and from many positions that are coveted by the patriotic Japanese. But the missionaries and the boards said: "We cannot use missionary funds to give the young people of Asia a purely secular education; we are here for Christ's sake, and for his only." The result was that some schools had to be closed and that the attendance of others dwindled from hundreds to dozens. It looked for a time as if the end of mission educational work in Japan had come; but a mighty protest went up from the Christian people of all lands.

The public opinion of Christendom, to which Japan is keenly sensitive, made her statesmen feel that a backward step had been taken. The order was not enforced, and to-day the mission schools are fuller than ever and with a tremendously enhanced influence, because in the hour of emergency, they would not buy the favor of the state at the cost of their faith. The missionary repudiates the statement of a professor at home that "the university is not responsible for the character of its graduates." Character is precisely what mission institutions are responsible for, and in the schools and colleges on the foreign field, the Church is producing it.

The hope of the future is largely in these schools. In many lands, the missionary encounters an opposition from adults that can only be compared to a wall. It is often difficult to break down that wall by direct attack; for inherited prejudices, social, business, and religious associations, and that fixity of character which usually comes with mature years in every land combine to make it hard to induce an adult to abandon the faith of his ancestors. The mission school undermines that wall. It takes character at a plastic period and shapes it for the future.

The opening of Asia to the influences of the modern world and the development of

Breaking Down Prejudice

Influence
Among Asiatic Nations

the native churches give special emphasis to the question of higher education. The need is emphasized by the fact that leading Asiatic nations are beginning to appreciate the importance of Western learning and are establishing colleges of their own. Hindu, Buddhist, and Moslem institutions will not, of course, train men for Christian leadership. The Churches must provide the needed facilities or see their young men go to schools dominated by antichristian influences. That the boards and the missions realize this is seen in the fact that there are now on the foreign field no less than 29,000 mission schools, of which more than 1,300 are of the higher grades, the total number of pupils being 1,304,905.

Another department of missionary activity is

Literary Work

Bible
Translation

History has proved that a knowledge of the Word of God is indispensable to intelligent and permanent faith. Therefore one of the duties of the missionary is to translate the Bible into the vernacular. We often hear that the Bible is now accessible to practically all the nations of the earth. It is true, and the missionary is the one who has made it so.

Books and Tracts

Bible translation, however, is not all of this work. Many books and tracts must be prepared. Most of the literature of the heathen world is unclean. There are, indeed, some excellent writings in the sacred books of Hinduism, Buddhism, and Confucianism; but at their best, they are merely ethical and are intermingled with a vast mass of error, puerility, and superstition. The books in common circulation are usually saturated with heathenism, if not actual immorality. The missionary, therefore, must create a Christian literature. This involves both translation and original composition.

Publishing has to follow preparation. Many lands had no printing-presses when the missionary arrived; so he had to create and operate them. He was among the first to see the providential significance of movable type and the application of steam to the printing-press. To-day, 160 presses are conducted by the Protestant mission boards in various parts of the world, and they issue annually about 400,000,000 pages of a Christian literature and the Word of God. The mission presses in Shanghai are exerting an enormous influence on the thought of one third of the human race, one of them printing over 97,000,000 pages a year. An interesting illustration of this occurred when 10,000 Christian women of China presented a copy of the New Testament, bound in silver and gold, to the

Mission Presses

Empress Dowager on her sixtieth birthday. The gift excited so much interest in the imperial palace that the Emperor purchased a copy for his own use.

Far-reaching Effects

That Chinese Bible has gone into many a yamen as well as into myriads of humble homes. A medical missionary, calling on the late Viceroy Li Hung-chang, found him reading a New Testament printed on the Shanghai mission press, and when a servant took the book away as the physician entered, the Viceroy said: "Do not put that in the library, take it to my bedroom, I will read it again." The mission press in Beirut, Syria, is probably doing as much as all other agencies combined to influence the Mohammedan world; for there the Bible is printed in the language that is spoken by two hundred million souls. Scriptures and explanatory books and tracts go forth from that unpretentious building, which are read not only in Syria and Palestine, but in Asia Minor, Arabia, Egypt, Tunis, Algeria, Morocco, India, and among the Arabic speaking colonies of North and South America.

Bible Societies

The Bible Societies give valuable coöperation in this department of mission work, paying the cost of printing the Scriptures, and, through their agents and colporteurs, aiding greatly in distributing them. These Societies should therefore be considered an integral and a very important part of this large development of missionary effort.

Emphasis may properly be laid upon literary work as a missionary agency. The peoples of Asia are not so much accustomed to public discourse as Western races. The priests of the native religions seldom or never preach, and it is much more difficult to influence people in that way than it is in England and America. The Chinese, in particular, are preëminently a people of books. Buddhism converted them, not by preaching, but by literature. The essay, the pamphlet, the placard, and more recently the newspaper, are the common means of disseminating ideas. Christianity must make a larger use of this method if it is to supersede Buddhism and Confucianism.

Power of the Printed Message

The printed Bible goes where the living voice cannot be heard. It brings its truths to men in the quiet hour. The force of its message is never lessened by controversy or perverted by error. Within a century, over 200,000,000 copies of the Bible have been printed in 360 different languages. If every missionary were to be banished, God's Word would remain in Asia, a mighty and indestructible power, operating as silently as the sunshine, but containing within itself the stupendous

Wide Dissemination

potency of a world's regeneration. To-day, the Persian and the Hottentot, the Korean and the Siamese are reading in their own tongues that "He is able to save them to the uttermost that come unto God by him," and we know that God's Word shall not return unto him void.

A phase of missions that touches all hearts is the

Medical Work

Example of Christ

Christ himself set the example by ministering to the sick. Indeed, he cited among the proofs of his Messiahship that "the blind receive their sight, and the lame walk, the lepers are cleansed, and the deaf hear." Twenty-four of his thirty-six recorded miracles were of physical healing, and there must have been scores of others, for we read that "all they that had any sick . . . brought them unto him; and he laid his hands on every one of them, and healed them." So medical work is an essential part of our Christian service in heathen lands. We cannot "pass by on the other side" those countless sufferers or shut our ears to their cries of agony.

Pain Aggravated by Superstition

Non-christian lands are lands of pain. All the diseases and injuries common in America, and others far more dreadful, are intensified by ignorance, filth, and superstition. An Oriental tour fills the mind with ghastly memories of sightless eyeballs, scrofulous limbs, and festering ulcers. If our child is ill, a physician's understanding of the case and its remedy, the sympathy of friends, and the sweet comforts of the gospel, make the sick chamber a place of peace and probable recovery. But in most heathen lands, illness is believed to be caused by a demon that has gotten into the body, and the treatment is an effort to expel it. Drums are beaten or horns blown beside the sufferer, in the hope that they will frighten away the demon. Hot fires are built to scorch it out, and of course the fierce heat adds to the distress of the patient. Sometimes even worse methods are employed. "What are those scars which so thickly dot the body?" we asked Dr. Neal, in China, as he examined a wan, pitiful little girl who had been brought in. "Places where hot needles have been thrust in to kill the spirit which is believed to have caused the pain," was the startling reply. "What a horrible foot!" we ejaculated, as we looked with Dr. Avison in Korea on a poor fellow who had hobbled into our room. A fall had made a bruise. A native doctor had told him that a demon had taken possession of it and that he should smear it with oil and set it on fire. Dirt and flies had aggravated the resultant sore, till the foot was literally rotting away.

Wonderful Relief

The horrors of superstitious maltreatment of the sick and injured are relieved in many lands only by medical missionaries who walk through those regions of pain in the name and spirit of the Great Physician, cleansing filthy ulcers, straightening deformed limbs, giving light to darkened eyes, healing fevered bodies, robbing death of its sting and the grave of its victory, and showing to weary multitudes that

"Thy touch has still its ancient power,
No word from thee can fruitless fall."

Heroic Ministry

In the Syrian city of Hums we saw the sick flock go to Dr. Harris as of old they doubtless flocked to Christ, and he gave such relief to scores of sufferers that men who would have stoned a preacher reverently listened to the physician while he talked to them of Christ. The day we entered Allahabad, India, 170 people died of the plague. Corpses were hourly carried through the streets. Shops were closed. The authorities, finding that preventive measures provoked dangerous riots, helplessly allowed the pestilence to run unchecked. Half the population had fled; but the medical missionary stood heroically at her post, freely going among the sick and dying, responding both by day and night to every appeal for help, giving what aid was possible in that swiftly fatal scourge, and telling all of the healing of the soul in Christ. Few men anywhere will touch a leper, but the medical missionaries lovingly seek them in a score of places, mitigating the horrors of a disease for which no cure is known and faithfully applying the remedy for the soul's leprosy.

A total of over 1,100 hospitals and dispensaries are being maintained on the foreign field by the Protestants and Anglicans, treating yearly about 2,500,000 patients. No other phase of mission work has done more to soften hearts and to open doors, no other been more fruitful in spiritual results. Standing in one of those humble buildings and watching the tender ministries to suffering, one feels sure that God loves the place, and he rejoices that in Asia as well as in America, men can say:

An Impressive
Total

“The healing of the seamless dress
Is by our bed of pain;
We touch him in life's throng and press,
And we are whole again.”

An unqualified statement that the fourth department of missionary activity is

All Forms of Work Evangelistic

Evangelistic Work

might give a wrong impression, for all forms of work are supposed to be evangelistic in spirit and in aim. Educational work is designed to reach the children for Christ and to train men for the ministry and other forms of Christian work. Literary work prepares and publishes the Bible and a helpful literature, that all may know the gospel by the printed page as well as by the spoken word. Medical work is intended not only to relieve suffering, but to do it in Christ's name and in such ways that the patients will accept Christ. There remains, however, much work that is distinctively evangelistic. Its magnitude may be inferred from the fact that there are now no less than 19,000 organized churches and a large number of unorganized congregations, with 2,346,086 adult communicants and 6,837,736 adherents, of whom 1,272,383 are enrolled inquirers.

Preaching and Itinerations

The direct preaching of the gospel naturally has a prominent place. There is an increasing number of churches in which there are stated sermons; but the main evangelistic work is done in less pretentious, though not less effective ways. The message is proclaimed in humble street chapels, in crowded bazaars, in secluded zenanas, from house to house, and on long country tours. The itinerations often occupy several months and include the visitation of hundreds of villages. All sorts of conveyances are used. Elephants, camels, horses, mules, donkeys, canoes, launches, schooners, house-boats, wheelbarrows, jinrikishas, bandy-carts, bicycles, and railroad trains, all serve the missionary's purpose as occasion offers, while not infrequently he travels on foot.

There are no bounds to the zeal of the itinerant missionary. A toilsome journey on elephants through the jungles of Laos brought us to Saturday night with the weary ejaculation: "Now we can have a day of rest!" The next morning we slept late; but the missionaries did not, for they spent an hour before breakfast in a neighboring village, distributing tracts and inviting the people to come to a service at our camp at ten o'clock. It was an impressive service—under a spreading bo tree, with the mighty forest about us, monkeys curiously peering through the tangled vines, the huge elephants browsing on the bamboo tips behind us, and the wondering people sitting on the ground, while one of the missionaries told the deathless story of redeeming love. The other missionary, Dr. Daniel McGilvary, was not present. Seventy-four years old though he was, he had walked three miles under a scorching sun to another village, and was preaching there. And we said: "If that is the way the missionaries rest, what do they do when they work?"

Zealous Toil

Splendid Fidelity

This is but a sample of the evangelistic fidelity that we saw everywhere. Missionaries whose immediate assignments are to medical or educational work take their turns in country touring. A physician in Africa never did a better thing for Christ than on a trip of which he wrote:

A Recruiting Tour

“I returned last week from a tour of seventeen days through the Utum country. The wet season was at its worst. All the rivers were flooded and the swamps were terrible to get through. Almost every day, I waded in water waist deep, sometimes for hours at a time. Much of my trip was through a country from which we had never been able to get any schoolboys, as the people were afraid to let them go so far from home and with white men of whom they knew but little. I went with the determination not only to preach the gospel, but to bring back with me some boys for our school. I knew if I could get a few for a start, we would get plenty in years to come. The Lord answered my prayers, and when we marched back through streams and forests, about seventy prospective pupils went with me. That long line of children, so ignorant and needy, some footsore and weary, marching away from their homes of darkness and sin towards the light of the dear Savior who died for them, was a sight which would move a heart of stone. Sometimes a mother in parting from her child would follow along for miles and then take me by the hands, and with tears rolling down her cheeks, say: 'Doctor, that is my only child, you will take good care of him, won't you?' Human nature is very much the same here as elsewhere."

Claims of Other Work

Reform movements in a community naturally grow out of spiritual work, but there is a difference of opinion as to the missionary's direct relation to them. Some urge that the missionary should not concern himself at all with such movements, his efforts being to instil in the minds of men the formative principles of the Christian religion and then leave these to work their legitimate results through saved men.

Reform Movements

Others, however, insist that the missionary cannot be indifferent to the practical application of the gospel to human society; that when orphans in India are starving, his efforts should include bread as well as exhortations; that when opium-smoking in China is an effectual bar to the entrance of the gospel, the missionary should ally himself with the effort to remove that bar; and that where the blind, the insane, the deaf and dumb are entirely neglected, the missionary who passes

Application
of the Practical Gospel

“by on the other side” exposes himself to the indignant censure which Christ visited upon the heartless, hypocritical priest and Levite.

Its Cure of Many Evils

It seems to us that the mediate course is the proper one. The gospel was intended to save men both for this life and for the life to come, and when a missionary goes among people who are wholly ignorant of the bearings of the gospel upon human life, it is surely within his province to show them how to live in time as well as eternity. This, as a matter of fact, is what the missionaries are doing. It is no small evidence of the value of mission work that missionaries have founded and are maintaining 333 asylums of various kinds for the afflicted and dependent classes. Though reform movements are results rather than objects of the missionary enterprise, they are nevertheless of value. Missionaries have done more than all others combined to lessen the evils of slavery, infanticide, intemperance, concubinage, opium-smoking, the degradation of woman, and kindred evils.

Gambling Abolished
in Siam

A signal instance of the usefulness of the missionary in matters of reform occurred in Siam. Gambling is the national vice. It was licensed and even encouraged by the government. The demoralizing consequences can be readily understood. This vice was vigorously combated by the missionaries, led by the Rev. Eugene P. Dunlap and powerfully reinforced by the Hon. Hamilton King, the American minister. They frankly represented to the king that gambling was inimical to the best interests of Siam and that the money that the government derived from it was obtained at a ruinous cost to character and legitimate industry. The king listened, and the result was the issuance of a royal decree, January, 1905, ordering the abolition of these gambling concessions by April, 1907.

Another illustration occurred in Shanghai, China, where there are about 20,000 Chinese prostitutes. Distressed by their pitiful lot, Mrs. George F. Fitch opened a rescue home to which the slave girls could flee for refuge. The home has attracted wide attention and it witnesses powerfully for Christ. A high official visited it one day with his wife, and as he noted the sweet ministries to the fallen, he marveled and said to his wife: "Nobody but Jesus' people would do this." That sentence vividly expresses the world-wide difference between the Christian and the non-christian. It is at once an indictment of Confucianism and a justification of missions. Nobody but "Jesus' people" are doing these things.

Ministry to the Fallen in China

It is apparent from all that has been said Time Required that the working out of so vast a movement as the missionary enterprise will require time. This is not a crusade whose object is to be attained by a magnificent spurt. Error and superstition are interwoven with the whole social and political fabric of the non-christian world and they are not to be overturned in a day. "We are," observes Benjamin Kidd, "in the midst of habits and institutions from which our civilization is separated by a long interval of development, where progress upward must be a long, slow process, must proceed on native lines, and must be the effect of the example and prestige of higher standards rather than the result of ruder methods."

Long Process in Europe

Most great reconstructions of society have come slowly, and religious transformations have been no exception. Christianity was three hundred years in conquering Rome, and even then the Roman world was far from complete conversion. The gospel has been operating on the peoples of northern Europe and their descendants for more than a thousand years, and no Christian feels that the work is done. It is to be hoped that other peoples will not take as much time as we took; but we cannot reasonably expect that a few decades will suffice.

Strenuous Opposition but Certain Victory

Moreover, we must count now on more strenuous opposition from the non-christian religions. At first, they were contemptuously indifferent to the missionaries. But as the priests see more clearly what radical changes Christianity involves, that it is, "turning the world upside down," contempt and indifference are giving place to alarm. The ethnic faiths are therefore setting themselves in battle array. It would be foolish to ignore their power, foolish to imagine that we are seeing the last of Buddhism in Japan and Siam, of Confucianism in China, of Hinduism in India, and of Mohammedanism in Turkey. Heathenism will die hard. The world, the flesh, and the devil are in Asia as well as in America, and are fighting more fiercely. It is no holiday task to which we have set ourselves. It is a gigantic struggle in which there are against us "the principalities, the powers, the world rulers of this darkness." Need have we of patience, of determination, of "the strength of his might" and "the whole armor of God." We must sternly face our task in the spirit of the man of whom Browning said: He " . . . never turned his back but marched breast-forward;

Never doubted clouds would break;
Never dreamed, though right were worsted,
wrong would triumph;
Held we fall to rise, are baffled to fight better,
Sleep to wake."

The issue is not doubtful, for, "If God is for us, who is against us?"

QUESTIONS ON CHAPTER V

AIM: TO REALIZE THE VARIETY AND VALUE OF THE WORK INCLUDED IN THE FOREIGN MISSIONARY ENTERPRISE

1. Write out all the forms of work engaged in by missionaries mentioned in the chapter and suggested to you by reflection.
2. How many of these are ordinarily engaged in by ministers at home?
3. How does the task of the missionary as a whole compare in magnitude and difficulty with that of the average minister at home?
4. In the light of the work needed, reconsider your opinion on the subject of the most desirable qualifications for a missionary.
5. Reconsider your opinion as to the way in which missionary training should differ from that of the minister at home.
6. Need a missionary be qualified along all these lines in order to be useful?
7. In preparing to teach a class of heathen children, what things ought a missionary to try to find out about their home life? Why?
8. What, about their personal ideas and attitudes?
9. What, about any past instruction they may have received?

10. What would it be desirable to know about the local surroundings and society?
11. In what way should the curriculum in a missionary school differ from that of schools of the same grade in this country?
12. What are some of the difficulties that a missionary teacher must expect to encounter?
13. What should be his principal educational aims?
14. In view of the aim of missionary work, why is it so important for the missionary to establish elementary schools?
15. Why are higher schools necessary?
16. What are the advantages of boarding-schools over day-schools?
17. What things besides the language ought a missionary to know in order to be a successful translator?
18. What advantages has the literary over any other of the forms of work?
19. What various kinds of literature ought to be distributed in order to build up a strong native Church?
20. What are the special advantages of medical work as a missionary agency?
21. What measures would you take to secure the greatest evangelistic efficiency in a dispensary and hospital?
22. In what ways should missionary addresses differ from sermons in this country?
23. What things ought the missionary to study in preparing his addresses?

150 Why and How of Foreign Missions

24. Why is it important for him to be well acquainted with local customs?
25. What special advantages has the evangelistic missionary over those engaged in other forms of work?
26. Which of these four forms of work does most on the whole to build up the native Church? Give several reasons for your opinion.
27. In what ways is each of these forms a necessary supplement to the other three?
28. Has Christianity a message only for the individual, or for society as well?
29. Have Christians in this country any duty to society except to evangelize it?
30. What should be the attitude of the missionary toward non-christian society as a whole?
31. What reasons have we for believing that the progress of Christianity on the foreign field will be more rapid than it was in Europe?
32. Sum up the principal needs of the work on the field.

THE NATIVE CHURCH

As to mission Church administration, for the sake of the future of the Church the missionary should train the churches with a view to speedy self-government and self-propagation. Some missionaries possessed of a strong individuality assume in themselves all the functions of the executive; they are in themselves Bishop, priest, deacon; and with their strong personality and fulness of energy they have not the patience to bend to the drudgery of training natives; therefore they take all of the responsibility upon themselves. But this only means disaster in the future, for when the strong man leaves the field, his work falls to pieces. For the sake of the Church and for the future of the Church we must subordinate self and selfish tendencies and bend our energies to get the best we can out of the native Christians.

—Frederick Galpin

The use of mission funds should be limited to the support of missionaries, the issue of literature, the founding of schools and hospitals and their support, and some help in the erection of church buildings. Converts should from the first be instructed in the necessity of sharing the burdens of Church work. The self-support of native churches should be facilitated by simplicity of organization, to the extent even, if necessary, of delaying for a time the full development of the pastorate.

—George B. Winton

VI

THE NATIVE CHURCH

THE development of a native Church is one of the most encouraging results of foreign missionary effort. The number of adult communicants on the foreign field is now (1910) 2,346,086. There are, besides, over a million adults who, having professed their faith in Christ, have been enrolled as catechumens and inquirers and are under special instruction with a view to full membership in the near future, while adherents number 6,837,736. The word "adherent" has a more definite meaning on the foreign field than at home, for it usually signifies that a member of a non-christian community has publicly separated himself, in name and position at least, from the religion of his country, and though not yet ready, in the judgment of the missionaries, to be baptized, he attends the church, and is willing to be known by his neighbors as a Christian.

This already considerable native Church is growing at the rate of nearly 150,000 communicants a year. The development of such a Church naturally brings into prominence cer-

Communicants and Adherents, Anglican and Protestant

Questions of Mission Policy

tain questions of mission policy. We have already seen that the aim of the missionary enterprise includes the development of an indigenous native Church. To this end, the native Church must be trained to self-propagation, self-support, and self-government.

Self-propagation

Self-propagation is insisted upon as soon as converts appear. They are taught from the beginning that as soon as they become Christians, the missionary motive should become operative within them, and that they are under precisely the same obligation as Christians in Europe and America to give the knowledge of Christ to others.

The Methods of Christ and Paul

This was the way Christ himself worked during his earthly ministry. He preached both to individuals and to multitudes wherever and whenever he had opportunity; but one of his chief efforts was to train up a band of disciples to perpetuate and extend the work after his departure. Paul also worked in this way. He would go to a city, preach the gospel, gather a band of disciples, organize them into a church, remain long enough to get them fairly started, and then go elsewhere.

Christianizing May Take Centuries

The modern missionary will have to remain a good deal longer than Paul did, for he does not find such prepared conditions as the great apostle found in the Jews of the dispersion. A land may be evangelized in a generation, but the Christianizing of it may be the toilsome process of centuries. Moreover, when the object has been attained in one country, the responsibility of the missionary and of the home Church will not cease, but simply be transferred to other populations. It is a long campaign upon which we have entered, but we should resolutely keep our purpose in mind.

This is not only wise in itself from the view-point of the success and permanence of the work, but it is absolutely necessary from the view-point of the men and money that are available. It is impossible for the Churches of Europe and America to send out and maintain enough missionaries to preach the gospel effectively to all of the thousand millions of the unevangelized world. To attempt this would be as foolish as it would be for a government to make an army out of major-generals, while making no provision for subalterns, non-commissioned officers, and privates.

Appeals to flood the foreign field with missionaries ignore the part that the native Church is to play in its evangelization. They apparently assume that the native Christians have no responsibility for making Christ known to their countrymen, or that they will not discharge it, and that the entire burden of evangelizing rests so exclusively upon foreigners that the people will never hear the gospel unless

Impossible to Christianize
Through Missionaries Alone

The Native Workers Must Reach the Masses

great numbers of white men are sent to preach it. Such an assumption is fundamentally wrong. The native worker is better for this direct evangelism anyway. He can live more economically than a foreigner, and he has a knowledge of native idioms and ways of thinking and manners and customs that no foreigner can ever obtain. Moreover, there is no gulf of race between him and his countrymen. There is much about the Asiatic and the African that will ever remain inscrutable to the American and the European. The former, in particular, is apt to be secretive and to make his outward manner a mask behind which there may be thoughts wholly unsuspected by a foreigner. But the native helper is able to get behind that mask, and just because he is a native, and probably one of superior force of character, the people will be more influenced by him than by the missionary.

Most Converts Are Made by Native Helpers

The late Bishop Ingle, of Hankow, said that the backbone of his work was the native clergy. Another of our experienced missionaries in the same region said recently: "I cannot remember having baptized any one who was not brought to me by a native Christian, except those who came to our schools as pupils. All foreign missionaries say with Saint Paul, concerning their native leaders, 'Now we live if ye stand fast in the Lord.' "

This is not meant to minimize the need of reinforcements. The present force is far too small for effective superintendence in many fields. The home Church should not relax its efforts to provide a more adequate supply of foreign workers; but while it is doing this, the missions should give more persistent effort to the development of a native agency, and so hasten the establishment of the native Church.

Missionary Reinforcements
Still Needed

We are not unmindful of the practical difficulties that beset this problem. In hardly any other part of the mission work is there so much need of prudence. Hundreds of natives want employment who are quite unfit for it. Nor is every one who is willing to work without pay qualified for efficient service. But these difficulties, and others that might be mentioned, can be overcome. The more successful the work, the more essential it is to develop the native ministry that is indispensable to conserve the evangelistic results already attained and which we hope to attain in yet larger measure in the future. The work will not be self-supporting in any proper sense, but on the contrary will become ruinously expensive if a large part of it must continue to be performed by foreign missionaries instead of by a native ministry supported by the people.

Prudence Required in Using Native Ministry

The native Church should be led to self-support as well as self-propagation. Here,

Native Self-support Also Desirable

also, the difficulties are formidable. The missionary goes to the heathen representing not only a superior, but a more expensive type of civilization. His scale of living, while moderate from our view-point, appears to them princely. Centuries of abject poverty and of despotic government have predisposed most Orientals to accept with eagerness whatever is given them. Accustomed to living, or rather half-starving, on an income of from thirty to one hundred dollars a year, the native regards the missionary on a salary of $1,000 not only as an individual of wealth, but as the representative of untold riches in the homeland. He is therefore tempted to go to him for the sake of the loaves and fishes, and this temptation is enormously strengthened if he gets the impression that the missionary may employ him as a helper, or that some individual or society in America may support him.

A Temptation to Use Money Freely

The missionary, in turn, is tempted to the free use of money by the wretchedness of the people and by the prospect of the visible results which may be temporarily secured by a liberal financial policy. Would-be converts flock to him in such circumstances; many helpers can be hired to apparent advantage, and buildings can be cheaply rented and furnished. But if he yields to the temptation,

“he puts himself and the young Church in a false relation at the outset. It is better to teach the converts to make their own arrangements, the missionary guiding by advice from his larger experience of their probable requirements, and only in the last resort giving pecuniary help.”<sup>1</sup>

On this point we must be increasingly firm. Leading an able-bodied man to Christ does not involve responsibility for his temporal support. He made his living before his conversion; why should he not do so after it? Persecution may hinder him for a time; but better far that he should suffer a little than that he should be pauperized at the outset. Christianity does not unnerve a man. It increases his ability to fight the battles of life. No native should be allowed to get the impression that if he becomes a Christian, he will be given work and a salary, even though the work be so sacred a one as preaching the gospel.

Our duty is to start Christianity in Asia, not to carry it, to give the gospel, to found its institutions, to aid them so far as necessary in their infancy, but to insist that as soon as practicable they shall stand upon their own feet. We must be patient and reasonable;

Conversion
Must Not Guarantee Support

Self-help Vital to Character

<sup>1</sup> Gibson, Mission Problems and Mission Methods in South China, 193.

for now, as of old, it is the common people who hear Christ gladly, and in Asia the common people are pitifully poor. We must not withdraw aid so rapidly as to injure the work. But the spirit of self-help is as vital to character abroad as it is at home. Strength comes with independence, and we must not devitalize the Christians of Asia by indiscriminate and unnecessary charity.

Native Money for Native Workers
the Goal

There is of course a legitimate use of foreign money in the earlier stages of the work. Infancy must be helped. The boards should make such appropriations as an equitable distribution of funds will permit for the employment of native evangelists and helpers; but the number should be limited to real needs and the salary should be only that which will enable them to live near the plane of their countrymen, while they should be made to understand clearly that this pecuniary arrangement is temporary. We must insist, in season and out of season, line upon line and precept upon precept, that while the missionary, being a foreigner, will be maintained by the people of America, the native workers must not look to the boards, but to their own people, for their permanent support. It will take a long time to reach it, but the ideal should be foreign money for foreign missionaries and native money for native workers.

We should resist the temptation to an artificial growth which the free use of money can beget. A Church developed by foreign money is built on quicksand. One self-reliant Church is worth more to the cause of Christ than a dozen dependent ones. There must, of course, be due regard to local conditions. Neither the missions nor the boards should violently revolutionize in fields where the opposite policy has been long pursued. Self-support cannot be attained by immediately discharging all native helpers, or by so reducing the work that nothing will be left to support. Change must be gradual; but no land will ever be evangelized until it has a self-supporting native Church. Let us work and give and pray for this essential aim of missionary effort.

In this connection it may be well to state that appeals made in the United States by individual Orientals for financial assistance in order that each may "return and preach the gospel to his own people," should be referred to the proper missionary board for investigation and action. Only natives of strong Christian character and thorough Christian education in native mission schools are likely to be made better missionaries by a foreign education. Only those whose special gifts point to the probability of their rising to leading positions in the native Church, requiring unusu-

Aim to Establish Self-supporting Church

Risk in Educating
Natives in this Country

ally wide understanding of national and religious problems, need the most complete education possible. For such men the Missionary Bishop and the Board of Missions are glad to secure a postgraduate course in the United States. Experience has shown that native converts can be most economically and effectively trained for Christian work in their own country in the institutions which are now in operation in almost every mission field, and which have been founded at considerable expense chiefly for this purpose.

Self-government
Also an Aim

The self-government of the native Church is an equally essential part of the missionary aim, though it may not be so quickly realized. Nevertheless, its ultimate attainment should shape our policy, and the native Church should be stimulated to self-support and self-propagation by being frequently reminded that both are indispensable prerequisites to independence. It is as idle in Asia as in America to imagine that men can live on the money of others without ultimately becoming dependent upon them.

Increasing Control by the Native Church

As for the missionary, he should frankly say of the native Church what John the Baptist said of Christ: "He must increase, but I must decrease." If there is ever to be a self-supporting, self-governing, and self-propagating native Church, we must anticipate the time when it will be in entire control. More and more definitely should missionary policy recognize the part that this growing Church ought to have in the work. In the past, the typical missionary has been primarily an evangelist to the heathen. He had to be, for his was often the only voice from which the message could be heard. The mission has been paramount and has been expected to run everything. Whatever was wanted, the board was asked to supply. But a native Church has now been created, and from now on we must concede its due share of responsibility for making the gospel known and for directing the general work. Many things need to be done in non-christian lands which it is not the function of the boards to do. Our business is to plant Christianity and help to get it started, and then educate it to take care of itself.

It is true that, in some lands, the native Church is yet in its infancy, and that it should have aid and counsel; but we should hold resolutely in view the principle that the mission is a temporary and diminishingly authoritative body, and that the native Church is a permanent and increasingly authoritative body. Even though the mission remains a century or more, as it must in some lands, this fundamental distinction should not be overlooked.

Foreign Force Must Be Temporary and Diminish in Authority

Phases of Embarrassment to Missionaries

It takes a great deal of grace for the missionary, after having been the supreme authority for years, to accept a place subordinate to that of the natives whom he has trained. Missionaries in some fields already find themselves in this position, and they would hardly be human if they did not feel uncomfortable. The spirit of independence has become so intense in Japan that many of the native leaders would have the Church refuse to recognize a congregation or preacher that receives foreign aid. Such a spirit of self-sacrificing independence is far more hopeful than flabby and supine acquiescence in external leadership. We cannot, however, view some phases of the situation without anxiety, nor can we fail to discern how embarrassing the position of the missionaries must be.

Triple Aim Maintained

The time required for each group of native Christians to develop into an independent national Church depends upon racial and national characteristics, upon economic conditions, and upon local environment. The relative strength of the impulses for self-support, extension, and self-government varies in different mission fields, but the triple aim is never forgotten by the missionaries and boards. Illustrations of this will be given in brief sketches of the work of the Church in Africa, Brazil, China, and Japan.

The Church in Liberia, Africa

In Liberia, white Bishops, clergy, and teachers trained a staff of native workers and built up a Church. Every mission churchyard and many a missionary in the United States, who has broken down in Liberia, testifies to the cost of the work. The Liberian Church may well be proud of its martyrs. As a result of their work, the Bishop, the clergy, and other mission workers, with the exception of one clergyman and his wife and two women missionaries, in 1910 are Negroes, thus making a practically complete native ministry.

Position of Native Workers

The Church is fully organized and in self-government is similar to one of our missionary districts in the United States. The financial resources of the Church and State in Liberia have developed slowly. The Republic is not rich; its citizens who came from the United States brought little or no capital, and several generations of slavery had not tended to develop the habit of self-support. The native tribes that the Liberian colonists found on their arrival have been gradually absorbed into the Republic, but they brought no working capital into the community. The people as a whole, through dread of political interference, have passed laws making it difficult for white men to make business investments in their country.

Condition of Church and Country

Under such conditions wealth in the Church, as in the State, grows slowly.

Problem of Self-extension

Advocates of self-extension in the Liberian Church have met some of the objections that advocates of missions to the American Indians met in the early days of Jamestown and that Bishop Whipple met in Minnesota, when settlements were few and Indians many, prejudice strong and misunderstandings mutual. The political relations of colonists and native tribes have made Church extension difficult for the Liberian Church. But the effort for self-extension is growing and many of the best clergy are men of native tribes.

The Church in Brazil

Main Steps of Development

The work of the Brazilian Church was begun in the State of Rio Grande do Sul, in 1889, by two clergy just graduated from the Virginia Seminary. They started by establishing schools, but almost immediately found that the people were ready and anxious for the formation of churches, and the mission has developed along parish rather than educational lines. For the first sixteen years the mission was supported by the American Church Missionary Society, at the end of which time the financial responsibility of the work was accepted by the Board of Missions.

As early as the year 1897, the Brazilian mission had taken the form of an organized Church, holding an annual council in which representative laymen sat with the foreign and native clergy. Local canons were adopted and plans formed for carrying on the work.

Manner of Church
Organization

In another respect the Brazilian work has differed from that in the Far East. It was not a mission of the American Episcopal Church, but an independent national Church, for which a Bishop, elected by its own synod, was consecrated by the bishops of the American Church, very much as our first Bishop Seabury was elected by the representatives of the congregations in this country in 1784, and consecrated for the Church in the United States by the bishops of the Scottish Episcopal Church.

Unique in Its Beginnings

In 1898 the Rev. Lucien Lee Kinsolving was chosen by his fellow workers to be the first Bishop of Southern Brazil, and in 1899 received consecration under the authority of the House of Bishops. In 1907 the Brazilian Church decided to ask the Church in the United States, through the General Convention, to accept the work in Brazil as one of its missions. The General Convention, meeting in Richmond in October, 1907, agreed to do this. Bishop Kinsolving resigned as a bishop of the Church in Brazil and was elected by the General Convention as Missionary Bishop of Brazil. He still retains the title, Bishop of Southern Brazil, although the whole Republic, not only the single state of Rio Grande do Sul as formerly, is now the field of the American Church.

Bishop Kinsolving

Progress of the Church

In 1910 the communicants numbered nearly twelve hundred, and yearly contributions of the churches and mission stations were more than twelve thousand dollars; one parish was self-supporting and two were rapidly approaching that state. Altogether there were seven churches and nine chapels, for the construction of which liberal offerings had been made in the field. The rate at which the Church has been extending itself is indicated by the fact that although at no time in the history of the mission were there more than five foreign clergy in the field, the native clergy in 1910 numbered seventeen and there were seven studying for the ministry. The Church in Brazil draws from all sorts and conditions of men. But she appeals more especially to the artisans and the smaller merchants, the people that constitute the hope and the heart of the community.

The Church in China

Self-support
in the
Chinese Church

For many years, the missionaries have endeavored to inculcate ideas of self-support, and the churches have responded with varying degrees of readiness. In nearly all our congregations, weekly offerings are taken for the support of the work. Pledges are made annually for the support of the parish, but in many cases the response has not been all that could be wished. In 1908 a missionary writes: "In some places, the spirit of independence has taken hold of the people, and they are anxious to do all they can for themselves. This is especially true in Shanghai and Hankow. One congregation in Shanghai is entirely self-supporting, and another nearly so. In Hankow the Cathedral congregation suddenly seized the idea that the Church was their own, and the contributions jumped in one year from less than a fourth to more than a half of their expenses."

"Most of our congregations contribute much more freely for special objects. The repairing of churches and the building of new ones, the purchase of land for cemeteries or other purposes are readily and generously contributed to. Special contributions are taken for special objects from time to time. A list of such objects with suggested dates on which collections should be taken was prepared by the Bishop and sent to all clergy. These objects include the Apportionment, Church extension in the Missionary Districts, Missions in Japan, the Bible and Tract Societies to which we are indebted for most of our Christian literature, and some other objects.”

Response for Special Objects

Recent Method to Promote Giving

An important step was taken at the Synod of Hankow in 1908. Among the provisional canons adopted was one which limited the right of lay delegates to vote at future synods to those parishes which had paid a certain small proportion of their parochial expenses. It should be mentioned that in most places the financial ability of the congregations is not great. In Hankow and Shanghai and a few other places there are a number of young men, graduates of our schools, who are in receipt of very good salaries. Many of them give liberally, but aside from them few of the converts have much to give. The poor give quite as liberally in proportion to their ability as the rich.

Self-government
in the
Chinese Church

From the beginning of our work the training of the clergy has had a most important place and our clergy have always had their share in the government of the Church. No court for the trial of any offense has ever been constituted where the Chinese were not represented. Fortunately few such courts have been needed. The organization of the Church has always proceeded on the assumption that the Chinese would ultimately have full control.

At Shanghai and Hankow

Shanghai has had a convocation without legislative power for some years past. There have been meetings in Hankow for various classes of workers, but there has been nothing of the nature of a synod until February, 1908. A meeting was held then in February, consisting of all the clergy, Chinese and foreign, together with lay representatives from the various parishes and representatives from among the catechists and school-teachers. A constitution and canons were provisionally adopted. The conventions will be triennial, as the inconveniences of travel are great.

In national organization the Church workers in China are making progress. For a number of years the Bishops held meetings at which they were attended by chaplains. Then in 1908 a meeting was held to which the foreign clergy of the various districts, English and American, elected delegates—two besides the Bishop from each district. This meeting did much toward the organization of the national Church.

National Organization

In the next year, the first conference of the entire Anglican Communion in China was held, attended by the bishops and Chinese and foreign clergy, and Chinese and foreign lay delegates. This conference adopted a constitution and canons to be recommended for final adoption by the first triennial synod in China to be held in 1912. In selecting a name, the conference was guided chiefly by the strong preference of the Chinese clergy and lay delegates for a name that would be distinctly Chinese and catholic. After full discussion, it was resolved to recommend to the synod of 1912, the adoption of Chong Hua Seng Kung Hwei. A free translation is "The Church in China."

Diversities of language present a serious difficulty. The people of the south and the north, where the English Church missions are located, speak dialects not understood by most of the people of the central section, where the districts of the American Church are located.

Self-extension
in the
Chinese Church

From the beginning a large part of the converts have been brought in as a result of the work of the Chinese. Most of our converts are first brought to the Church by friends who have already become Christians. The teaching of inquirers and catechumens is entirely in the hands of the Chinese clergy and catechists. Very few foreigners get time to do much preaching to the heathen. They are almost exclusively occupied in organization and in teaching and preaching to the regular congregations of Christians. One missionary writes: "I hardly baptized a convert whom I knew before he was an admitted catechumen except schoolboys and some of my servants. They are as a rule brought in by other converts, instructed by the catechists and Chinese clergy, and only examined and baptized by the foreigner, and even this is frequently done by the Chinese clergy.”

So in every important aspect of the work the preparation of an independent Church develops, and the Sung Kung Wei, as the Church in China is called, will, in God's good time, grow from the position of a foreign mission to that of another national branch of the Church.

The Church in Japan

In the first stage of the mission work, the clergy of course were all foreigners, and they had to do all the clerical and evangelistic work which was done. During this brief period, the missionary was in the same relation toward several Japanese congregations that a clergyman would be in this country. Not only was the preaching and the conduct of service under his direction, but the whole pastoral work was in his hands.

First Stage of Growth

In the second stage of the work the missionaries had the oversight and direction of native workers. The work of the missionary under these conditions, if he had, as he usually did, a number of stations or congregations under his charge, was more nearly like that of a bishop than that of a clergyman in charge of a church in this country. He visited his congregations from time to time, administered the sacraments, and when he was present did such

Second Stage of the Work

other work as seemed desirable to do; but the Japanese helper was usually resident, and upon him naturally and necessarily fell the chief burden of the work. If he were incompetent, the missionary could do little. If he were competent, much might be done. But it was very seldom that a Japanese worker could be of any special value unless he was fitted to work in a great part independently. It can be seen that such a condition as this could be only temporary. The early missionaries had need of assistance, and missionaries were tempted to hurry Japanese into the work to assist them without the education and other preparation which men ought to have to do such work.

The Further Stage

What remains to be done is that work should progress further on the lines on which it has developed already; that the Japanese Church should have as soon as possible native pastors who even while deacons are not under the jurisdiction of any priest, nor eventually of any foreign bishop; and that unordained Japanese evangelists should also be under the direction of the Japanese clergy. This is true to some extent already and it is only lack of numbers that prevents all such work passing into Japanese hands.

The Nippon Sei Kokwai

The present situation as to the native Church in Japan is that the Apostolic Church is already there under the name of the Nippon Sei Kokwai,

So far as its organization is concerned it is independent now. It has no closer ecclesiastical connection with the Church of England or with our American Church than these have with one another. It is simply in communion with both. Its constitution is more or less modeled upon that of the American Church, but the American Church had nothing to do with its formation and has no power to change or modify it in any way. It was established by a synod which consisted of all the clergy, native and foreign, and representatives of the laity, among whom there were in the first synod, several foreigners. There have never been any foreign lay delegates in any subsequent synod.

The relation of the foreign missionary to the Japanese Church is unique. As missionaries, or as Bishops or clergy of the American Church, they have no standing whatever; but the Japanese Church has recognized the English and American Bishops and clergy as being, in consequence of their relation to the home Church, and to the mission work before the time of the establishment of the Nippon Sei Kokwai as Bishops and clergy for the time being of the Japanese Church.

Every Bishop and every foreign clergyman before he can take his place as delegate or constituent member of a synod of the Japanese

Relation of Foreign Ordained Missionaries

Its Dual Character

Church, must first sign a statement promising conformity to the doctrine, discipline, and worship of that Church. Our missionaries in Japan to-day have therefore a dual relation. The Bishop is the Bishop of the American Church, working, so far as his relation to that Church is concerned, under the Constitution and Canons of the American Church. He is also Bishop for the time being of the Japanese Church, and in his relation to that he is under the Constitution and Canons of that Church. In the same way, the missionary is, so far as his relation to the home Church is concerned, governed only by the law of the home Church, and so far as his relation to the Japanese Church is concerned, only by the law of the Japanese Church. Out of this there arises a double set of institutions in the mission field.

The Bishop
and the American
Church

So far as the American Church is concerned, each district has its Bishop, its council of advice, composed of Japanese and foreigners, and its convocation. The Bishop, because of his dual relation, has all the authority of a Bishop in both the Japanese and American Churches. He is also the sole representative of the Missionary Society in its financial relations, and he, in conjunction with the Board of Missions, controls all expenditures within the limits of the appropriation. He has also the power of appointment and removal of foreign missionaries within the field. Where native workers receive their salaries through the Board of Missions, he has the same power of appointment and removal; and, in addition, as being sole representative of the body which employs them, has power within the limits of the funds at his discretion to increase, diminish, or discontinue their salaries.

Returning to the Nippon Sei Kokwai, it has at present (1908), first of all, its six Missionary Districts under two American and four English Bishops, which coincide, so far as the American Districts of Tokyo and Kyoto are concerned, with the Japanese Districts of North Tokyo and Kyoto, because the American Church accepts these Japanese Districts as its own sphere of operations. None of these six districts are dioceses in the strict sense, and yet they come nearer the status of dioceses than our American Missionary Districts either at home or abroad. Each has its own District Council, which meets annually as a matter of constitutional right. It has legislative power in the same manner and to about the same degree as an American diocese, and on the whole falls short of the status of the latter only in its inability to elect its own Bishop.

In each district there is a standing committee. It has powers exercised by standing committees in this country, with some addi-

Self-government
in the Nippon Sei Kokwai

The Standing Committee

tions, the tendency of the Japanese Church being a little more to centralization than prevails here.

The Local Synod

The local Synod corresponding to our Diocesan Conventions, consists of the Bishop, who presides, all of the Japanese clergy and as many of the foreign clergy as have the Bishop's license, and have signed the promise of conformity to the doctrine, discipline, and worship of the Japanese Church, together with evangelists in pastoral charge of congregations, and lay delegates from each congregation having more than a certain number of communicants. Usually, smaller congregations can unite to send a joint delegate. In the Synod thus constituted, the Bishop at the present time is a foreigner, the clergy part foreign and part Japanese, with the Japanese in most districts in the majority, while the lay delegates are entirely Japanese.

The General
Synod

The General Synod of the Japanese Church corresponds to our General Convention, and like it meets every three years. It is composed of the present foreign Bishops, of clerical delegates who are elected by the clergy at the district Synod, and of lay delegates who are elected by the laity. Of the clerical delegates a pretty large majority are now Japanese. The lay delegates are all Japanese.

Limitation of Independence

This mingling together of foreigners who are supported and controlled by foreign churches with natives is one of the things that limits the actual and complete independence of the Japanese Church. It is only in the lay vote of the synods that purely Japanese opinions and convictions are represented. On the whole, however, the Japanese clergy being in the majority in most districts, the clerical vote comes reasonably near representing Japanese opinion. With the episcopal vote, it is of course different. The Bishops are all foreigners. They are men who are as well acquainted with Japanese conditions and the Japanese Church as is possible. They are not Japanese and cannot be expected to represent the Japanese Church, although for the time being, they govern it as Bishops and help to govern it as members of the synods. It is here then, in the episcopate, that the Japanese Church is furthest removed from independence. The last synod, however, passed in 1908 a canon which looks to a change here. This canon provides that whenever in any given locality there are six self-supporting congregations, they may take action toward the formation of a diocese. This action is reported to the Standing Committee of the whole Church, whose duty it is to investigate the matter and report to the next General Synod. If the General Synod authorizes the erection of the diocese, it will then have the right to elect its Bishop. His consecration would be asked from Bishops of the American or English Churches.

Future Status Rests with Japanese

How soon the Church in Japan will be independent, it is impossible to say. The initiative in these matters rests where it ought to rest, with the Japanese Church. The power rests also with them. Although that Church includes, as a part of its working force, foreign Bishops and other clergy having full status in that Church, yet as an organization it is entirely independent, and was so recognized by our own General Convention in 1886.

Mode of Transition

The future of the mission work in Japan must certainly be, that under whatever form of Church government, the missionaries must be helpers, not rulers. It will be seen, then, that the one remaining step of progress toward the independence of the Japanese Church is largely a matter of persons rather than of institutions. The organization is there. What remains is to substitute Japanese for foreigners in the episcopate, to put foreigners under the control of the Japanese Bishops, and eventually to let all the ordinary clerical work pass into Japanese hands.

Self-support in the Nippon
Sei Kokwai

The independence of the Japanese Church is delayed also by its scanty financial resources. Progress toward self-support has been slower than in other departments, and rightly so. There have always been doctrinaires who maintain that a native Church ought to be self-supporting from the beginning. The particular way in which self-support can be helped, however, varies according to local circumstances. Very often foreign help, wisely applied, is the most efficient method of bringing about self-support. Take, for example, Christ Church, Osaka (now self-supporting), built as a chapel to Saint Timothy's School, more than twenty-five years ago. It holds twenty-five benches, each six feet long. In Christ Church, want of space makes it necessary to have a rule that children shall not be allowed to accompany their parents to the services. It is hard for a Japanese mission station to attain self-support in a building too small properly to hold a congregation that was large enough to support itself. Can any reasonable person maintain that it would pauperize the Japanese Church or hinder its self-support, if they had temporary and sufficient help in providing adequate church buildings?

The great difficulty in the way of Japanese self-support is not so much want of will as want of means. For the most part, the people of means are not in the Christian Church. So far as intelligence and education are concerned, the membership of our Churches, and of Protestant Churches, is far above the average of the country. No better single proof of

National Church Lacks Means

that can be found than this, that in the first Japanese Parliament, thirteen out of the 300 elected members were Christians, though there was only one Christian to every 400 of the population. And so among officials, professional men, students, and the like, the proportion of Christians has been for a long time much greater than among the population at large. But the Christians for the most part are young people, with young families, and small incomes. That such congregations as these should be expected to build churches such as are needed for their work in a city like Osaka, with more than a million people, or like Tokyo, with nearly two millions, is not reasonable. In both places, land is expensive, and churches must be substantially built to guard against fire. No one, however, disputes the fact that every native Church ought to be self-supporting as soon, and to as large a degree, as possible.

Educational Call for Assistance

If the Japanese Church cannot yet be independent in the work of its churches, still less can it be expected to be so in Christian education. In such institutions as Saint Paul's College, Tokyo, is now the great opportunity for Churchmen in the United States to help forward the cause of self-support by training up men to lead the Japanese Church. How many colleges in America are self-supporting, and how important are they to Church and State? It is not the withholding of money at this stage of development that will accomplish the purpose, but rather the judicious use of money at the right time and in the right place.

The Church in Japan is doing much in this direction through the personal service of its members to win their fellow countrymen to Christianity. The blind believer of one of our missions, who for a long time refused to be baptized, because he did not dare to become a Christian on account of his blindness, thinking he could not be a missionary, is a dramatic instance of the sense of responsibility which permeates members of the Japanese Church. Nor are there lacking brilliant instances to show the sense of personal responsibility as a Christian to spread Christianity. The Holy Trinity Orphanage and School for Feeble-minded Children was begun and carried on by Mr. Ishii for so many years simply because he knew the need, and was ready to give all he owned to supply it. Similarly, the Widely Loving Society, an Orphanage started and carried on by the Kobashi family, was also founded as an individual philanthropy, and shows the flowering of Christianity in a Japanese household. Again, the Church School of Miss Ume Tsuda, is not a diocesan institution, but is the successful missionary venture of a gentlewoman of Japan, who sees the need of young girls about her for all that Christianity can give, and is supplying it. Instances like these, where individuals having spent their money, keep giving their lives, indicate the vitality in the Japanese Church of the Christian instinct to Christianize others. No wonder that the Nippon Sei Kokwai, by sending and supporting one of its own clergy as a missionary to the Japanese in Formosa, has also given an example of a sense of corporate responsibility and gratitude for God's truth.

Self-extension

QUESTIONS ON CHAPTER VI

AIM: TO UNDERSTAND THE PROBLEMS INVOLVED IN THE GREAT AIM OF FOREIGN MISSIONS

1. If the heathen and Moslem world be estimated at 1,000,000,000, what number of them are still unreached?
2. If we have less than 8,000,000 communicants and adherents in Anglican and Protestant missions at present, how long would it take at the same rate to Christianize the world?
3. What should be the missionary policy in order to accelerate this rate of progress?
4. Sum up all the advantages that the foreign missionary has over the native as a missionary.
5. Sum up all the advantages which the native has over the foreigner as a missionary.
6. In view of these relative advantages, how should the work be divided between the missionary and the native?

7. What is the relative importance to the missionary of these three forms of work: (1) Preaching to the unevangelized; (2) teaching the inquirers; (3) training native workers.
8. In view of your answer to the last question, what sort of training ought the missionary candidate to receive?
9. To what extent ought the missionary policy to be followed by the clergy at home?
10. What special methods would you employ to render the native Church self-propagating?
11. In what ways can the educational work cooperate in rendering the native Church self-propagating?
12. In what ways can the literary work coöperate?
13. If you were a missionary, would you feel justified in suggesting the duty of giving to a convert who had not one tenth of the comforts of life which you enjoyed?
14. At what point should the subject of giving be presented to the native convert?
15. What things that the native Church would otherwise be deprived of should be supplied from the mission funds?
16. What things would it be better for the native Church to forego until it can pay for them itself?
17. Give the arguments for and against a free use of mission funds in the support of the native Church.
18. What measures would you take to increase self-support in a native congregation that had been backward in this respect?

186 Why and How of Foreign Missions

19. In what ways do self-support, self-propagation, and self-government stimulate each other in the Nippon Sei Kokwai, and the Sung Kung Wei?
20. How does the emphasis on various methods of missionary work in Liberia differ from that in Brazil, and why?
21. In what ways is the missionary better fitted than the native to govern the native Church?
22. What are the principal dangers in allowing the native Church too much self-government?
23. What are the principal dangers of allowing the native Church too little self-government?
24. What measures would you take as a missionary to avoid both of these classes of dangers?
25. What can you do as a Churchman in regard to the organization of national Churches?

THE MISSIONARY ENTERPRISE
AND ITS CRITICS

Many men who at home moved in good society and were active members in a Christian church, are now living in some Eastern city in a manner that disgraces the name of our English civilization. Some native critics, seeing this, say: "Christianity will not endure exportation to the East." It cannot be expected that among such as these, who know no Sabbath, and who have abandoned, for the present at least, restraint against intemperance and impurity, there will be found any who do not hate the very name missionary because of the condemning conscience that the suggestion arouses in themselves.

—James L. Barton

The longer one stays in India the more evidence one has that the future well-being of this country, and above all, the extension, permanence, and quality of British influence, depend largely upon the progress of missions.

—James Bryce

The enemies of foreign missions have spoken tauntingly of the slowness of the work and of its great and disproportionate cost, and we have too exclusively consoled ourselves and answered the criticism by the suggestion that with God a thousand years are as one day. We should not lose sight of the other side of that truth—one day with him is as a thousand years. God has not set a uniform pace for himself in the work of bringing in the kingdom of his Son. He will hasten it in his day. The stride of his Church shall be so quickened that commerce will be the laggard. Love shall outrun greed.

—Benjamin Harrison

VII

THE MISSIONARY ENTERPRISE AND ITS CRITICS

THE purity of the missionary's motive, the unselfishness of his work, do not exempt him from criticism, nor should they. Any enterprise which depends upon public support is a fair object of criticism. Boards and missionaries are human and have their share of human infirmities. They have a right to insist that criticism shall be honest; but within that limit, any one has a right to scrutinize their methods and work and to express his conclusions with entire frankness.

Honest
Criticism Legitimate

Critics should remember, however, that the foreign missionary enterprise deals with agents who are not mechanical instruments or soldiers amenable to military discipline, but living, intelligent men and women who, like critics, are fallible; who are scattered all over the world; whose acts often appear strange because determined by conditions which people at home do not understand; and that some mistakes are inevitable when men of one race attempt to live among and influence those of a different race. We shall know everything

Conditions Make Mistakes Inevitable

and do things just right when we get to heaven; but on earth we must feel our way along and learn by experience. Home enterprises, business, educational, philanthropic, and religious, are exposed to a constant fire of criticism, some of it just. It is notorious that men conducting them often blunder, and that the result is frequently waste, duplication, and even failure. Why then should we demand perfection of foreign missionaries, especially when their work is conducted under difficulties far more numerous and formidable? We do not object to the fact of criticism; we simply urge that it be reasonable and made with due regard to conditions.

Four Classes of Criticisms

Criticism of missionaries and their work may be roughly divided into four classes:

From Friends

First, those which come from friends of the work who see defects, or think that they do. Some of these criticisms are undoubtedly just, and should be heeded. Others are based on misapprehensions, and should elicit temperate explanations. The attitude of the boards and the missionaries toward this whole class of critics should be that of the inspired writer who said: "Faithful are the wounds of a friend."

From Those Who Are Ignorant

Second, criticisms which come from those who are ignorant of the real character, aims, and work of the missionary and the methods of mission boards. This is a large class. There are many people who have never seen missionary work, or met a missionary, or read a missionary book, but who, seeing in the newspapers or hearing from some friend the class of criticisms to which reference has just been made, jump to the conclusion that they are true.

The increasing interest in Asia and the comparative ease with which it can now be visited are rapidly enlarging the stream of foreign travelers. Unfortunately, many of them are mere globe-trotters, knowing little and caring less about missionaries, people who at home are only languidly interested in Church work and who do not know what religious effort is being put forth in their own city. Abroad, they usually confine their visits to the port cities and capitals, and become acquainted only at the foreign hotels and clubs. They seldom look up foreign missions and missionary work, but get their impressions from more or less irreligious and dissolute traders and professional guides. What they do see of missions sometimes misleads them. Typical mission work can seldom be seen in a port city. The natives often exhibit the worst traits of their own race, or are spoiled by the evil example of the dissolute foreign community. The mission buildings are apt to be memorials or other special gifts, and give a misleading impression as to the scale of missionary expenditure. Hearing the sneers at the clubs and hotels, and without going near the missionary himself, the globe-trotter carries away slanders, which, on his return, are sensationally paraded in the newspapers and eagerly swallowed by a gullible public. The Hon. Edwin H. Conger, former American Minister to China, wrote: "The attacks upon missionaries by sensational press correspondents and globe-girdling travelers have invariably been made without knowledge or investigation, and nine tenths of them are the veriest libel and the grossest slander."

Verdicts of the Globe-trotters

Cross-questioning
a Critic

It is often interesting to propound some questions to such a critic. An American merchant returned from China to say that missions were a failure. Whereupon his pastor proceeded to interrogate him. "What city of China did you visit?" "Canton," was the reply. "What did you find in our mission schools which impressed you as so faulty?" The merchant confessed that he had not seen any schools. "And yet," said the pastor, "our board alone has in Canton a normal school, a theological seminary, a large boarding-school for girls, and several day-schools, while other denominations also have schools. Well, what was there about the mission churches which so displeased you?" Again the merchant was forced to confess his ignorance; he did not know that there was a church in Canton till his pastor told him that there were, in and near the city, scores of churches and chapels, some of them very large, and with preaching not only every Sunday but, in some instances, every day.

“But surely you were interested in the hospitals,” queried the worker. “One of the largest hospitals in Asia stands in a conspicuous position on the river front, while the woman’s hospital in another part of the city is also a great plant, with a medical college and a nurses’ training school connected with it.” Incredible as it may seem, he knew absolutely nothing about these beneficent institutions. Further inquiries elicited the admission that the critic knew nothing of the orphanage, or the school for the blind, or the refuge for the insane, and that he had made no effort whatever to become acquainted with the missionaries. He was a little embarrassed by this time, but his questioner could not refrain from telling him the old story about the English army officer and the foreign missionary who met on an ocean steamer. The army officer had contemptuously said that he had lived in India thirty years and had never seen a native Christian. Shortly afterward, he recited with gusto his success in tiger-hunting, declaring that he had killed no less than nine tigers. "Pardon me," gently said the missionary, "did I understand you to say that you have killed nine tigers in India?" "Yes, sir," replied the colonel. "Now that is remarkable," continued the missionary, "for I have lived in India for thirty years and have never seen a tiger." "Perhaps, sir," sneered the colonel, "you were not looking for tigers." "Precisely," was the answer of the missionary, "and may not that have been the reason why you never saw any native converts?"

Further
Disclosures

"Not With Outward Show"

When Mr. Stead got the impression that "If Christ came to Chicago," with its thousands of churches and Christian institutions of every kind, he would find little but vice and crime, it is not surprising that the casual traveler sees few external signs of Christianity in a populous pagan city. It was Christ himself who said: "The kingdom of God cometh not with observation," or as the margin reads, "not with outward show."

From Those Without Sympathy for the Missionary Motive

Third, criticisms which are based on want of sympathy with the fundamental motives and aims of the missionary enterprise. It is sometimes wholesome for those who live in a missionary environment to ascertain how their methods appear to people who are outside of that environment. Attention may thus be called to defects which would otherwise escape notice. Men, however, who are opposed, not merely to certain methods, but to the essential character of the movement itself can hardly be considered fair critics. They will never be silenced, because they are inaccessible to the Christian argument. Their criticisms have been demolished over and over again, but they reappear unabashed within a month. Even when their objections are overcome, their opposition remains. Critics of this class will always ridicule the effort to propagate a religion which they do not practise. They do not confine their criticisms to the missionary, but sneer at churches at home, declaring that ministers are hirelings and communicants hypocrites. It does not necessarily follow that the criticisms of such men are unfounded; but "it is within the right of the missionary to protest against being arraigned by judges habitually hostile to him, and it is within the right of the public to scrutinize the pronouncements of such judgments with much suspicion."

Some of the critics of this class live in Europe and America, but many of them reside in the treaty ports of non-christian lands. We do not mean that the foreign colonies in the concessions are wholly composed of such men. They include, on the contrary, some excellent people to whose sympathy and helpfulness the missionaries are greatly indebted.

Testimony as to Foreign Colonies
by Widely Traveled Laymen

We are not quoting missionaries, however, but widely traveled laymen in the statement that the life of the typical foreigner in Asia is such that a missionary cannot consistently join in it, no matter how cordial his desire to be on friendly terms with his countrymen. Colquhoun declares that foreigners in China go to get money and then return, do not learn the language, have little intercourse with natives and know little about them. Mr. Frederick McCormick, for six years Associated Press correspondent in China, says that "the foreign communities are not in China, but at China," simply "ranged on the shore"; that "they carry on their relations with China through a go-between native"; that their "society is centered about a club, of which the most conspicuous elements are the bar, race-track, and book-maker"; and that "the life, for the most part, of the communities is in direct antagonism to that of missionaries" who live and work among the Chinese.

From Those Whose Interests Conflict

Fourth, criticisms which spring from conflicting interests. Such are the objections which originate with traders who sell rum in Africa and opium in China, who traffic in the virtue of native girls, or entice away coolies under specious "contracts" which result in virtual slavery. Some regions have long been infested by men of this infamous type, and while some of their nefarious practises have been broken up, others still continue. Almost every port city in non-christian lands has dens of vice which are kept by white men or women and which pander to the lowest passions. Men of this kind are, of course, virulent haters of missionaries. Charles Darwin asserted that "the foreign travelers and residents in the South Sea Islands, who write with such hostility to missions there, are men who find the missionary an obstacle to the accomplishment of their evil purposes." There are, too, native priests who, like the silversmiths of Ephesus, find their craft in danger, and circulate falsehoods regarding missionaries as political plotters or adepts in witchcraft. It is not uncommon in Chinese cities for placards to be conspicuously posted, charging missionaries with boiling and eating Chinese babies.

Let us now take up some current criticisms. Several of the most common have already been considered in connection with other chapters, and need not be repeated here.

"Missionaries are inferior men." The man who makes this objection simply shows that he does not know missionaries or that he is generalizing from some exceptional individual. There are undoubtedly missionaries who say and do foolish things, just as some of us at home do, and once in a while one proves

Some Current Criticisms

"Missionaries Inferior"

to be incompetent. Ninety-four per cent. of the business men of the United States are said to fail at some time in their lives. Why, then, should a few missionary failures be deemed an adequate ground for condemning the whole class? The reader who hears criticisms which impress him as serious should demand names and particulars and forward them to the board with which the missionary is connected. The boards have neither desire nor motive to shield misconduct. They will promptly investigate and take such action as the facts may justify.

Counter-testimony

Travelers and officials like Charles Darwin, Lord Lawrence, Sir Harry H. Johnston, Sir Robert Hart, Sir Mortimer Durand, the Hon. John W. Foster, the Hon. William Jennings Bryan, Mrs. Isabella Bird Bishop, the Hon. Charles Denby, and scores of others, have borne high testimony to the worth of missionaries. Those who do not confine their observations to treaty-port hotels or draw upon their imagination for facts, but who have eyes to see and ears to hear the mighty forces which are gradually inaugurating a new era in Asia, report that the real missionary is an educated, devoted man, the highest type of Christian character, and that in the spirit of the Master, he heals the sick, teaches the young, translates the Bible, creates a wholesome literature, and inculcates those great truths of the Christian religion to which Europe and America owe whatever of true greatness they possess. No one is perfect, but the man who can write only evil of such men and women does so at the expense either of his intelligence or his candor.

“Converts are not genuine, but are attracted to the missionary by the hope of employment or support.” The number of native communicants in connection with foreign missionary churches is 2,346,086, while the enrolled adherents number 6,837,736; but the total number of native agents is 103,066, many of whom are paid either wholly or in part by the native Christians themselves. Making all due allowance for others who are employed as servants or who receive assistance in schools, the number who are aided in any way by the foreigner is relatively insignificant. The great body of native Christians have no financial motive whatever for confessing Christ. The Hon. Charles Denby, for thirteen years American Minister at Peking, has reminded the world that during the Boxer uprising, “the province of Chih-li furnished 6,200 Chinese who remained true to their faith in spite of danger, suffering, and impending death. It is said that 15,000 converts were killed during the riots, and not as many as two per cent. of them apostatized. In the face of these facts, the old allegation that the Chinese converts are treacherous, venal, and untrue, must be renounced. Let us not call them 'rice Christians' any more."

“Converts Not Genuine”

Needless Irritation Aroused

"Missionaries needlessly irritate the Chinese by interfering with native lawsuits." A difference should be observed here between the practise of the European Roman Catholic missionaries and the American Protestant missionaries. The former champion the cause of their converts, particularly when they believe that lawsuits are instigated by the opponents of Christianity. It is the policy of the Protestant boards and missions to discourage such interference, and the missionaries themselves are more and more clearly seeing the imprudence of it. Comparatively seldom now does a Protestant missionary give offense in this matter.

"Missionaries Hated by Natives"

"Missionaries are universally hated by the natives, while the ordinary foreigner is tolerated." This is grossly untrue. The missionaries are far more popular with the people than any other foreigners. They travel freely, unarmed and unprotected, and it is comparatively seldom that they are molested. When they are attacked, it is by a class of ruffians who, in the slums of an American city, attack a Chinese gentleman on the streets. Imperial edicts have specifically declared that "the Chinese Government . . . . is not opposed to the work of the missions." It would be easy to fill pages with extracts from edicts commending the missionaries and their work. In 1895, the Prefect of Nanking issued a proclamation which included the following passage:

"Now having examined the doctrine halls in every place pertaining to the prefecture, we find that there have been established free schools where the poor children of China may receive instruction; hospitals where Chinamen may freely receive healing; that the missionaries are all really good; not only do they not take the people's possessions, but they do not seem to desire men's praise. Although Chinamen are pleased to do good, there are none who equal the missionaries."

A Prefect's Words

During their visits in America, both Viceroy Li Hung-chang and Viceroy Tuan Fong freely expressed their gratitude for the services of the missionaries, the latter declaring that "the awakening of China may be traced in no small measure to the hands of the missionaries; they have borne the light of Western civilization to every nook and corner of the Empire." In 1900, the people of Paoting fu murdered the missionaries; but they soon realized their mistake, gave land for a better station site, and presented to the new mission hospital a silk banner on which was worked in letters of gold:

Declarations of High Officials

"This place bestows grace on the Chinese people." In the same city, a high official visited the mission church and, seeing the ten commandments upon the wall, said to the missionaries: "If you can get that teaching into the minds of my soldiers they will be good soldiers. I see now one notable characteristic of Christianity: it seems to have the power to go out from oneself to others; it is not self-centered, but works for others."

Hon. Charles
Denby's
Statement

The Hon. Charles Denby, late American Minister to China, probably was as competent to pronounce upon this question as any one, and he wrote: "On an analysis of the bitter antichristian movement, we find that it is largely to be explained as primarily antforeign; that is, largely directed against missionaries solely as foreigners, not solely as teachers of a foreign religion. The missionaries, in the vast majority of cases, are loved by those Chinese with whom they succeed in establishing intimate relations, and they are almost universally respected by all classes in the communities in which they are well known."

Further
Marks of Appreciation
from Rulers, Princes, and Officials

A large volume would be required to quote the appreciative words of Asiatic and African princes, nobles, magistrates, and people, wherever they have become acquainted with the real character and objects of the missionaries and have been able to separate them from the white men who have political or commercial designs. Hardly a month passes without some substantial token of this appreciation in the form of gifts to mission institutions. The Empress Dowager of China, the Mikado of Japan, the Emperor of Korea, the King of Siam, East Indian, African, and South Sea princes without number, and even Moslems, have made such gifts; while scores of officials, like the Chinese Governors of Shan-tung and Formosa and the Siamese Minister of the Interior, have tried to secure missionaries for the presidency of government colleges or for other responsible posts.

“Missionaries make trouble for their own governments.” The Hon. William H. Taft, while Secretary of War, in an address in New York City, April 20, 1908, referred to this criticism and emphatically denounced it as unfounded. Well-informed government officials do not complain about missionaries as a class, though they may sometimes object to the indiscretion of a particular individual. Suppose the missionary does occasionally need protection; he is a citizen, and what kind of a government is it which refuses to protect its citizens in their lawful undertakings? No one questions the right of a trader, however dissolute, to go wherever he pleases and to be defended by his country in case of danger.

“Missionaries Make Trouble
for Their Own Governments”

Has not a missionary an equal right to the benefits of his flag? The Hon. John Barrett, formerly American Minister to Siam, says that 150 mission workers gave him less trouble in five years than fifteen merchants gave him in five months.

“ Missionaries Injure and Denationalize
Their Converts ”

“Missionaries injure and denationalize their converts.” Christianity never injured or denationalized any one. It simply made him a better man—more honest, more intelligent, more charitable, more loyal to his own country. Why should it injure an Asiatic or African to stop worshipping demons and to begin worshipping the true God; to renounce drunkenness, immorality, and laziness, and become a sober, moral, and industrious citizen? The fact is that native Christians in Asia and Africa are the very best element in the population. The Chinese Government made a large grant for indemnity for the lives of the Chinese Christians who were murdered during the Boxer uprising. How much it meant to the poor survivors will be understood from the fact that the share of the Christians in a single county was 10,000 taels. But none of the Christians in that county would accept the indemnity. They took compensation only for the property they had lost; but they gave one tenth of that to support several Chinese evangelists to preach the gospel to their former persecutors, and afterward they tried to raise a fund to pay back to the government the indemnity that they did receive. Such a course indicates both genuineness of faith and loyalty to the Emperor.

An illustration of this is found in the way St. John's College, Shanghai, has been developing patriotism in its students. This appears not only in the St. John's College Echo, the college paper, and in the songs and festivities of the students, but also after they graduate in their willingness to sacrifice for the good of the community and in their bright vision of the greatness and the opportunities before their country.

"There is much to be done in our own land, and charity begins at home." One might urge with equal truth that education begins with the alphabet; but it ends there only with the feeble-minded. A New York rector says that we ought to give less for foreign missions and more for the conversion of "the foreigners within the shade of our churches." If, however, he had looked into the Report of the Charity Organization Society of New York, he would have found a list of 3,330 religious and philanthropic agencies in his own city. The first time I visited New York's slum district, I was amazed by the number of missions. A high authority declares that "there is no other city in the world, except London, where

"Charity Begins
at Home"

more is being done to point the lost to the Son of God than in New York."

Churches and Workers at Home

Many have seen the statement that St. Louis has one church for 2,800 of population, Chicago one for 2,081, Boston one for 1,600, and Minneapolis one for 1,054. In the United States there are about 197,000 Protestant churches, or one for every 380 of the non-Catholic population, one Protestant minister for 514, one Christian worker for seventy-five, and one communicant for four. Talk about the relative needs of the United States! In a town of 8,000 people, there are three Presbyterian, three United Presbyterian, three Methodist, two Episcopal churches, and one Christian church. "For every missionary Protestants send abroad they hold seventy-six at home." A million Americans are engaged in distinctively religious work, about 150,000 of whom devote themselves to it as a separate profession. In the light of these facts, the statement that "the Church cannot see the misery which is under her own nose at home" appears rather absurd.

A Contrast Abroad

How is it abroad? In South America there is only one ordained missionary for 154,000 people; in Africa and India, for 186,000; in Siam, for 200,000; and in China, for 603,000! Dr. Arthur Mitchell wrote of a journey of only twenty-four hours from Hang-chou to Shanghai: "I was absolutely awestruck and dumb as I steamed past city after city, great and populous, one of which was a walled city of 300,000 souls, without one missionary of any Christian denomination whatever, and without so much as a native Christian helper or teacher of any kind. That silent moonlight night, as I passed unnoticed by those long, dark battlements shutting in their pagan multitudes, was one of the most solemn of my life; and the hours of daylight, when other cities, still larger than many of our American capitals, were continually coming into view, and the teeming populations of the canals and rivers and villages and fields and roads were before my eyes, kept adding to the burden of the night."

As for money, the running expenses of all the churches in the United States absorbed $158,000,000 in 1900. In New York City alone they were $8,995,000. These figures are exclusive of the cost of new structures, general charities, mission contributions, and other objects. The cost of maintaining the Protestant Episcopal churches in the United States for that year was $14,606,000; Presbyterian, $20,375,000; Baptist, $12,348,000; Methodist, $26,267,000; and Roman Catholic, $31,185,000.<sup>1</sup> Almost fabulous sums are given to colleges and libraries and philanthropic institu-

Money Expenditures
at Home
and Abroad

<sup>1</sup> Christendom Anno Domini, 1901, Vol. I. 533, 534.

tions in America; two men, Mr. John. D. Rockefeller and Mr. Andrew Carnegie, having contributed over $200,000,000 within less than two decades, the former bestowing $32,000,000 on the General Education Board in a single gift. The yearly aggregate of large individual gifts to educational and charitable institutions is over $150,000,000. How much of this enormous sum goes to foreign missions has not been separately estimated; but the total income of all the boards in the country is only $8,972,418, and as the bulk of that comes in small sums from congregations, it is evident that but little, if any, more than $1,000,000 of these large individual gifts goes abroad. In general, our home churches spend ninety-four cents in America for every six cents that they give for the evangelization of the world. Of England and Ireland, it is said that the income of their churches approximates $150,000,000, and that of this immense sum only $8,000,000 is spent on missions to the heathen.

Christianity's Earlier
Missionary
Movements

It is true that there are unconverted people at home; but what would be thought of a business man who declined to sell goods outside of his own city until all its inhabitants used them? The fact that some Americans are irreligious does not lessen our obligation to give the gospel to the world. If the early Church had refused to send the gospel to other nations until its own nation was converted, Christianity would have died in its cradle, for the land in which it originated was never really Christianized and is to-day Mohammedan. The argument that our own land is not yet evangelized would have made the church at Antioch disobey the command of the Holy Spirit to send forth Paul and Barnabas. It would have kept Augustine of Canterbury from carrying the gospel to England. It would have prevented the founding of churches in America, and would, to-day, cripple all our home missionary work, since there is no other part of the United States more godless than the Eastern States where the gospel has been known the longest. Christ did not tell his disciples to withhold his faith from other nations until they had converted Palestine; he told them to go at once into all the world and preach the gospel to the whole creation; and it is because they obeyed that command that we have the gospel to-day.

The argument that we ought to convert America first because it would then convert the world, is one of those glittering generalities that do not bear analysis. America has had the gospel for two hundred years, and is not converted yet. England has had it more than a thousand years, and is as far from conver

Present Duties Not Confined to America

sion as America. How long will it be at this rate before our homelands will be saved? Must countless millions die without Christ, while we are trying to win white men, most of whom have heard of him hundreds of times? Not so did Christ direct his disciples. He did not tell them that the best way to influence the world was to regenerate their own land, though such an argument would have had greater force than it has now. He sent them out with orders to preach at once not only at home but abroad. It is the duty of American Christians to seek to convert America, and the British Christians to seek to convert Great Britain. But that is not their only duty, just as the conversion of Palestine was not the only duty of the early Church. I am not urging neglect of our responsibilities at home, but simply replying to the frequent objection that they are a reason why subordinate attention should be given to our responsibilities abroad. The Christian of today, like the Christian of the first century, has a God-ordained mission to the world which cannot wait upon the indifference or hostility of people at home.

The Plea Issues
in an Absurdity

Indeed no nation ever will be wholly Christianized, for not only will there always be individuals who refuse or neglect to accept Christ, but before any one generation can be converted, a new generation of young people will have grown up and the work must thus be ever beginning anew. The argument, therefore, that we should not preach the gospel to other nations until our own has been converted issues in an absurdity, since it would perpetually confine Christianity to those nations which already have it and would forever forbid its extension.

“Missionaries are forcing another civilization on lands which already have civilizations of their own that are adapted to their needs.” No other objection is more common and no other is more baseless. The missionary does not force his civilization upon the natives, nor does he interfere with native customs, except when they are morally wrong. A higher type of civilization does indeed follow the labors of the missionaries; but this is an incidental result, not an object. Even if it were otherwise, the Hon. Charles Denby expresses the opinion that, “if by means of gentle persuasion we can introduce Western modes and methods into China, we are simply doing for her what has been done, in one way or another, for every nation on the globe.” As for forcing religion, no native is obliged to become a Christian against his will. The missionary simply offers and explains the gospel. Surely he has as much right to do this as English and American

“Forcing An Alien Civilization”
Upon Them

A Misuse of Language

manufacturers have to offer and explain their flour and cotton and machinery and liquor. "To talk to persons who choose to listen; to throw open wide the doors of chapels where natives who desire may hear the Christian faith explained and urged upon their attention; to sell at half-cost or to give the Bible and Christian literature freely to those who may care to read; to heal the sick without cost; to instruct children whose parents are desirous that they should receive education—surely none of these constitute methods or practises to which the word 'force' may be applied, under any allowable use of the English language."<sup>1</sup>

"Their Religions Are Good Enough"

"The religions of other races are good enough for them." Then they are "good enough" for us, for the peoples of "other races" are our fellow men, with the needs of our common humanity. We have not heard, however, of any critic who believes that Islam or Hinduism or Buddhism are "good enough" for Europeans and Americans, and we have scant respect for the Pharisaism which asserts that they will suffice for the Persians and East Indians and Chinese.

The Need in China

The Chinese are justly considered the strongest of the non-christian races, but Chang Chih-tung, Viceroy of Hu-peh and Hu-nan, writes with sorrow of "lethargy, sensuality, and vice," and he frankly adds: "Confucianism, as now practised, is inadequate to lift us from the present plight."<sup>1</sup> The Emperor himself recognized the justice of this characterization, for he declared in an imperial rescript that he had "carefully inspected the volume" and that "it embodies a fair and candid statement of facts." Answering a question whether it is worth while to send foreign teachers to supplant the old religions by Christianity, the Hon. Charles Denby wrote: "As Buddhism undoubtedly exercises a salutary influence on the national life of China, so the introduction of Christianity now will instruct, improve, and elevate the Buddhists. The adoption of Christianity means to the Chinese a new education. He becomes mentally regenerate. He abandons senseless and hoary superstitions. His reasoning powers are awakened. He learns to think. The world has not yet discovered any plan for the spreading of civilization which is comparable to the propagation of Christianity."

<sup>1</sup>The Hon. Chester Holcombe.

It is difficult to understand how an American or European who inherits all the blessings of our Christian faith, can deny those blessings to the rest of the world. Christianity found the white man's ancestors in the forests and swamps of northern Europe, considerably

Christianity
and the White Man's Ancestors

<sup>1</sup>Chang Chih-tung, China's Only Hope, 74, 75, 95, 96, 123, 145.

lower in the scale of civilization than the Chinese and Japanese of to-day. Jerome wrote that when "a boy, living in Gaul, he beheld the Scots, a people in Britain, eating human flesh; though there were plenty of cattle and sheep at their disposal, yet they would prefer a ham of the herdsman or a slice of the female breast as a luxury." The gospel of Christ brought us out of the pit of barbarism. Why should we doubt its power to do for other races what it has done for ours?

The Gospel
is for All

The notion that each nation's religion is best for it, and should, therefore, not be, disturbed, is never made by those who have a proper understanding of Christianity or of its relation to the race. It is based upon the old paganism which believed that each tribe had its own god who was its special champion against all the other gods. Such an idea is not only false in itself, but it is directly contrary to the teachings of Christ, who declared that his gospel was for all men and that it was the supreme duty of his followers to carry it to all men.

"Missionaries
Accomplish
Very Little"

"Missionaries are accomplishing very little." This objection might fairly offset the objection that missionaries are making revolutionary changes. Both cannot be true. The fact is that missionary work is remarkably successful, and more so now than ever before.

The justification of foreign mission effort is not dependent upon tabulated results, but it is nevertheless interesting to note them. The natural presumptions would be that Christianity would make very slow progress in a heathen land, for it is regarded with suspicion as an alien faith. It is opposed by a powerful priesthood and at variance with long-established customs. Family ties, social position, caste prejudice, combine to keep one from confessing Christ. It would not be reasonable, therefore, to expect as high a percentage of increase as at home, where centuries of Christian work have prepared the soil and created an atmosphere, where Christianity is popular and worldly motives blend with religious to attract men to the Church.

Where the Greater Increase Might Be Expected

But what are the comparative facts? The average annual increase of the Protestant Churches in America is .0283 per cent.,<sup>1</sup> while the increase on the foreign field is .0685 per cent.<sup>2</sup> The government census in India shows that while the population from 1891 to 1901 increased two and a half per cent., the Protestant Church membership increased fifty per cent. The gain in China in twenty years has been over 100 per cent.<sup>3</sup> The first Protestant

Remarkable Gains in the Foreign Field

<sup>1</sup> Dr. H. K. Carroll, The Christian Advocate, 1903-1908.

<sup>2</sup> Dr. D. L. Leonard, Missionary Review of the World, 1903-1908.

<sup>3</sup> From 80,682, in 1887, to 191,985, in 1906, not counting 136,126 catechumens.

missionary arrived in the Philippine Islands in 1899; within nine years about 30,000 adult communicants were received. In 1886, the Korea missionaries reported the first convert. Seven years later, there were only about 100 in the whole country. Now there are 120,000 Christians. While not all mission fields have been as fruitful as those that have been mentioned, the general rate of progress is excellent, the number of baptisms in foreign mission lands in 1907 being 141,127.

A Record
Without Parallel

In spite of the advantages in Europe and America—historic associations, favorable public opinion, splendid churches, numerous workers—Christianity is making more rapid progress on the foreign field than in the home field. We have been working in heathen lands only about a hundred years, in most fields far less than this, and yet the number of converts is already greater than the number of Christians in the Roman Empire at the end of the first century. No other work in the world is so successful and no other yields such large returns for the expenditures made.

Canon Farrar's Trenchant
Conclusion

“To sneer at missionaries,” said Canon Farrar,—“a thing so cheap and so easy to do—has always been the fashion of libertines and cynics and worldings. So far from having failed, there is no work of God which has received so absolute, so unprecedented a blessing.

To talk of missionaries as a failure is to talk at once like an ignorant and faithless man."

QUESTIONS ON CHAPTER VII

AIM: TO ESTIMATE THE VALUE OF THE CURRENT CRITICISMS AGAINST MISSIONARIES

1. What are the principal difficulties encountered by the foreign missionary that are not ordinarily found at home? Arrange these in order of importance.
2. How well prepared are the social customs of non-christian lands to fit in with a religion like Christianity?
3. In what ways do the differences of traditions and ideals tend toward misunderstanding between the people of the East and the West?
4. How long and under what circumstances do you think a man ought to study problems created by these difficulties in order to criticise them intelligently?
5. Is there any class of persons who have better opportunities than the missionaries to study these problems intelligently?
6. For what reasons is the average missionary better qualified to understand the people than the average trader or diplomat?
7. What arrangements have missionaries on the field for exchanging views with one another and shaping broad policies?
8. What criticisms have you heard from those who were earnest friends of the enterprise?

218 Why and How of Foreign Missions

9. Do these criticisms involve the general body of missionaries, or only certain individuals?
10. Are these criticisms more serious than those passed by earnest Christians on methods of work at home?
11. Do they justify failure to support the enterprise?
12. Which body do you think has the best right to criticize the other, the missionaries or the home Church?
13. What credentials have we a right to demand from critics of missions?
14. What questions would you ask of a globe-trotter who returned with an unfavorable impression of missionary work?
15. Why is it that so many casual travelers receive such impressions?
16. If some missionaries are really inferior men, do you think it is the fault of the denominational boards?
17. What wise and practicable measures at present neglected would you suggest to raise the standard of the missionary body?
18. What percentage of Church members in this country do you consider "genuine"?
19. Do you think a larger percentage would endure martyrdom for Christ than was true of the Chinese Christians?
20. What special motives has the missionary more than all other foreigners for cultivating the friendship of the people among whom he works?

Missionary Enterprise and Its Critics 219

21. What more than others have missionaries done for the communities in which they live?
22. Would we be justified in withholding Christianity from a nation, even if the presentation of it should arouse hatred in some individuals?
23. How would you solve the problem of delivering a man from degrading national customs, without denationalizing him in any way?
24. Was the Church at home more or less strong than it is to-day when the Holy Spirit sent out Barnabas and Paul?
25. What would you consider a fair distribution of workers and money between the 80,000,000 of our population at home and the over 300,000,000 of the non-christian world, for whom the Christians of America may justly be held responsible?
26. If God really intended Christ for the whole world, which has the better reason to complain of neglect, the Church at home or the Church abroad?
27. Why is the civilization of Christendom superior to that of the non-christian world?
28. What has Christianity done for the civilization of Europe?
29. Will the Christ who has been a blessing to Europe be a curse to Asia and Africa?
30. How do you account for the fact that Christianity progresses more rapidly on the foreign field than at home, if the work is not well-pleasing to God?

THE SPIRIT OF THE MISSIONARY

Mrs. Judson chose to give up her children for her Lord's poor children in Burma; and after many a long tender caress, she had bidden them good-by, and the great steamer turned her prow toward the open sea. The almost broken-hearted mother stood and watched the vessel until through the mist in her eyes it had ceased to be even a speck on the distant horizon, and then turning into her room sank into her chair and exclaimed: "All this I do for the sake of my Lord."

—Charles B. Galloway

To this is added the decision to spend that life of chosen poverty in a foreign land, in most cases, amid unfavorable surroundings, far away from personal friends, among people who misunderstand his motives and misinterpret his acts. In his life the missionary faces with the people the uncertainties of pestilence, and he is always amid the insanitary conditions of uncivilized lands. Whatever may be said, viewed from a merely physical standpoint, the life of the missionary is full of personal sacrifice from beginning to end.

—James L. Barton

Tell Horace's mother to tell my boy Horace that his father's last wish is that, when he is twenty-five years of age, he may come to China as a missionary.

—Horace Tracy Pitkin

VIII

THE SPIRIT OF THE MISSIONARY

WE join the missionary in protesting against the impression that he is essentially different from other good men. There is no halo about his head. He is not a saint on a pedestal. He does not stand with clasped hands and uplifted eyes, gazing rapturously into heaven. We have met more than a thousand missionaries, and we have been impressed by the fact that they are neither angels nor ascetics, but able, sensible, and devoted Christian workers. The typical missionary is more like a high-grade Christian business man of the homeland than a professional cleric. He is preeminently a man of affairs. He makes no pathetic plea for sympathy for himself, but he wants coöperation in his work, and to have people at home feel that the work is theirs as well as his.

Missionaries
Like Other Christians

The physical hardships of missionary life are less than are commonly supposed. Steam and electricity have materially lessened the isolation that was once so trying. Mail, which a generation ago arrived only once in six

Physical Hardships, in Many Cases, Decreased

months, now comes once or twice a week. Swift steamers bring many conveniences of civilization that were formerly unobtainable. The average missionary has a comfortable house and sufficient food and clothing. His labors, too, have been lightened in important respects by the toil of his predecessors. He finds languages reduced to written form, textbooks to aid him in his studies, and a variety of substantial helps of other kinds.

Discomforts Still Abound

There are many fields, however, where conditions are not so pleasant. Those who complain of a New York August can hardly realize the meaning of an Indian hot season, when life is almost unendurable by night as well as by day for months at a time. The Western world is appalled by a case of bubonic plague on an arriving ship, and it frantically quarantines and disinfects everything and everybody from the suspected country; but during all those awful months when plague raged unchecked in India, the missionaries steadily toiled at their posts. We are panic-stricken if cholera is reported in New York harbor or yellow fever in New Orleans; but cholera nearly always prevails in Siam, and yellow fever in Brazil, while smallpox is so common in Africa that it does not cause remark. Sanitation means much to the Anglo-Saxon; but, save in Japan, the Asiatic knows little about it and the African nothing at all. What would be the condition of an American city if there were no sewers or paved streets, if garbage were left to rot in the sun, and all offal were thrown into the streets? That is actually the condition in the villages of Africa and in most of the cities of Asia, except where the foreigner has forced the natives to clean up. Several years ago a Methodist Bishop solemnly affirmed that he identified seventy-two distinct smells in Peking. The city is cleaner now, but it cannot be called sanitary yet, while the native cities of Chefoo and Shanghai appall the visitor by their nastiness. Everywhere in the interior vermin literally swarms in the native inns, and usually in the homes of the people.

But while the physical hardships are less than are commonly supposed, the mental hardships are greater.

Mental Hardships

First among these is loneliness. This is not felt so much in the port cities, for there are foreign communities, occasional visitors, and frequent communication with the rest of the world. But in the interior the isolation is very depressing. Letters from home friends which were at first numerous, gradually become less frequent, till relatives and board secretaries become almost the only correspondents and the lonely missionary feels that he is forgotten by the world of which he was once a part—"out of sight, out of mind."

Loneliness

An Upbearing Environment Lacking

At home, too, while we are conscious of a downward pressure, we are also conscious of a sustaining and uplifting force. Few of us realize to what an extent we are upborne by environment. There is everything to buoy us up—the companionship of friends, the restraints of a wholesome public sentiment, and the inspiration of many meetings and conferences. We are situated morally, as one is sometimes situated physically, in a crowd, so wedged in that he cannot fall. But on the foreign field there is little to hold one up and much to pull him down. There is no public Christian sentiment to sustain, few associations to cheer, no support from large numbers of neighboring friends and ministers.

A Constant Strain

It is desperately hard to stand alone, and the missionary must often stand alone. All the customs of the country are against him; all its standards below him. He receives nothing, but is expected to give everything. There is a constant strain upon his sympathies and his spiritual vitality, with nothing to feed the springs of his own spiritual life. The tendencies are down, down, always down. The man who lives in an interior city of China or Africa may be compared to the workman who toiled in the caissons of the great bridge over the East River, New York, where the pressure of the unnatural atmosphere affected the heart and lungs and imagination to the point of utter collapse. In the words of Benjamin Kidd:

"In climatic conditions which are a burden to him; in the midst of races in a different and lower stage of development; divorced from the influences which have produced him, from the moral and political environment from which he sprang, the white man does not in the end, in such circumstances, tend so much to raise the level of the races amongst whom he has made his unnatural home, as he tends himself to sink slowly to the level around him. In the tropics, the white man lives and works only as a diver lives and works under water. Alike in a moral, in an ethical, and in a political sense, the atmosphere he breathes must be that of another region than that which produced him and to which he belongs. Neither physically, morally, nor politically, can he be acclimatized in the tropics. The people among whom he lives and works are often separated from him by thousands of years of development."

Depressing Phases of the Tropics

Then there is the weary monotony of missionary life. The novelty of new scenes soon wears off, and the missionary is confronted by prosaic realities. It is impossible for the minister in the United States to understand the depressing sameness of life in the interior of China. The few associates of the missionary are subject to the debilitating influences which depress him. It is difficult for any woman in America to know what it means for Mrs. A. to live from one year's end to another without seeing another white woman except Mrs. B., who, though a devoted missionary, is not exactly the person that Mrs. A. would have chosen for an intimate associate if she had been consulted. We at home can choose our friends, and if Mr. X. is not congenial, we do not have to be intimate with him; but the missionary has no choice. He must accept the intimacy of the family assigned to his station whether he likes it or not.

Monotony of Missionary Life

Separation from Children

The separation from children is harder still. There comes a time in the life of every missionary parent when he realizes that he cannot properly educate his child amid the appallingly unfavorable conditions of a heathen land. The whole tone of society is so low that it is all that the missionary can possibly do to keep himself up to the level of the homeland. Indeed, he is painfully conscious that he frequently fails to do it, and that one of the urgent necessities of a furlough is not so much to get physical rest, as to tone himself up again mentally and spiritually in a Christian atmosphere.

What then can be expected for his immature child but degeneration?

The average missionary therefore must send his children to the homeland to be educated. We hope that none of the mothers who read these pages will ever have occasion to know what a heart strain is involved in placing ten thousand miles in distance and years in time between parent and child. There are chambers of the human heart that are never opened save by a baby's hand. After the tendrils of the soul's affection have wound round a child, after a soft, tiny hand has been felt on the face, and the little one's life has literally grown into that of the parent, separation is a fearful wrench.

The Wrench to Parents' Hearts

There is, too, the distress which every sensitive mind feels in looking upon suffering that one is unable to relieve. Sir William Hunter said that there are a hundred millions of people in India who never know the sensation of a full stomach. An equally great number in China live so near starvation that a drought or a flood precipitates an appalling famine. All over Asia, one sees disease and bodily injury so untended, or what is worse, mistended, that the resultant condition is as dreadful as it is intolerable. Dr. John G. Kerr of Canton was so overcome by the sufferings of the neglected insane in that great city that he could not endure them, and when he could not get help from America, he started an asylum at his own risk. Mrs. A. T. Mills of Chefoo felt driven to the same course by the pitiful condition of deaf-mute children. Heathenism is grievously hard on the poor and the sick and the crippled, while the woes of women in maternity are awful beyond description. Yet, amid such daily scenes, the missionary must live.

Unrelievable Distress

Contact with Debasing Vice
and Immorality

Then there is the mental suffering which comes to any pure-minded man or woman in constant contact with the most debasing forms of sin. Most Asiatics have no sense of wrong regarding many of the matters that we have been taught to regard as evil. They are untruthful and immoral. The first chapter of the Epistle to the Romans is still a literal description of heathenism. Its society is utterly rotten, and nowhere else in all Asia is it more licentious than in Japan, which is lauded as the most intelligent and advanced of all Asiatic nations. We do not forget that there is immorality in America, but here it is compelled to lurk in secret places. It is opposed not only by the Churches, but by civil law and public sentiment. In Asia, vice is public and shameless, enshrined in the very temples. We saw the filthiest representations of it in the great Lama Temple in the capital of China. India, which boasts of its ancient civilization, makes its most sacred places literally reek with vice. The missionary often finds his own motives grossly misjudged by hostile priests and prudent people. The typical Asiatic scoffs at the idea that the missionaries come to him for an unselfish purpose. A single man is often misunderstood; a single woman is nearly always misunderstood. Heathen customs do not provide for the pure unmarried woman, and charges are freely circulated, and sometimes placarded on walls or buildings, in ways that are most trying.

The soul in such an atmosphere feels as if it would suffocate. The pressure of abnormal conditions tends to debilitation. It sets nerves on edge and exposes to diseases, mental as well as physical.

A Morally Suffocating Atmosphere

Another phase of the strain of missionary life is the spiritual burden. To look upon myriads of human beings who are bearing life's loads unaided and meeting life's sorrows unhelped, to offer them the assistance that they need for time and for eternity, and to have the offer fall upon deaf ears—this is a grievous thing. Nothing in the missionary life is harder than this for the man or the woman who has gone to the foreign field from true missionary motives. It is akin to the strain that broke Christ's heart in three years; for it was this

Spiritual Burden

that killed him, and not alone the nails or the spear.

Physical Danger

The factor of physical danger is not so common now as formerly, but it is not wanting, even to-day. There are martyrs' graves in India, China, Africa, Persia, Turkey, and the South Sea Islands. In some lands, missionaries are insolently denied the rights guaranteed by treaty to every American citizen. Their property is destroyed, their work hampered, their freedom of movement limited, their very lives menaced.

Why
Missionaries Persistently
Hold Their Posts

The critic impatiently asks: "Why do missionaries persist in remaining at their posts, when they know that they are jeopardizing their lives and bringing anxiety to their relatives and embarrassment to their government? Why do they not fly to the safer ports, as the British and American consuls often advise them to do?"

The Soldier Spirit

Why? Partly for the same reason that the Spartans did not retreat at Thermopylæ, that the engineer does not jump when he sees that death is ahead, that the mother does not think of herself when her boy is stricken with diphtheria. Shall the missionaries leave the native Christians to be scattered, the mission buildings to be destroyed, the labor of years to be undone, the Christian name disgraced? The missionary is a soldier; his station is the post of duty. James Chalmers of New Guinea, of whom Robert Louis Stevenson said: "He's as big as a church," and who was finally clubbed to death and eaten by cannibals, declared that "the word 'sacrifice' ought never to be used in Christ's service." And in a speech in Exeter Hall fifteen years before his death, he exclaimed: "Recall the twenty-one years, give me back all its experiences, give me its shipwrecks, give me its standing in the face of death, give it me surrounded with savages with spears and clubs, give it me back with the spears flying about me, with the club knocking me to the ground—give it me back, and I will still be your missionary."

Such missionaries form the "far-flung battle line" of the Church of God. The patriotism of Briton and American is stirred by the thought that the sun never sets on their dominions; but a holier inspiration should thrill them as they realize that the sun never sets on their missionaries, who journey through heat and cold, and dust and mud, burned by the midday sun, drenched by sudden storms, eating unaccustomed food, sleeping in vermin-infested huts, enduring every privation incident to travel in uncivilized lands—and yet, in spite of all, instructing native helpers and church officers, settling disputes, visiting the dying, comforting the sorrowing, and above all and in all preaching the glad tidings of the kingdom of God. It can be truly said of them:

Heroism More Than Patriotic

“There is no place they have not been,
The men of deeds and destiny;
No spot so wild they have not seen,
And measured it with dauntless eye.
They in a common danger shared,
Nor shrunk from toil, nor want, nor pain.”

Unparalleled Devotion

Missionary annals abound with inspiring instances of devotion. The last act of Dr. Eleanor Chesnut, one of the martyrs at Lien-chou, China, was to tear off a portion of the skirt of her dress and bind up an ugly gash on the head of a Chinese boy, who had been accidentally injured by the mob. The dying words of Mrs. Machle were a plea to her murderers to accept Christ. The last letter of Mr. Peale was such a large-hearted expression of sympathy with the Chinese that the Chinese minister at Washington wrote: “His words seem to me to have a prophetic ring; in his untimely death, America has lost a noble son and China a true friend.” The first message of Dr. Machle, after the tragedy which cost the lives of his wife and daughter, was not a demand for revenge, but a vow to consecrate the remainder of his life to the welfare of the Chinese.

Persistence and Joy in the Work

Some moral triumphs are greater than the physical victories of war. A medical missionary in Persia refused a palace and a princely income as personal physician to the Shah, saying: "I came to Persia to relieve the distresses of the poor in the name of Jesus." An educator in China declined the high-salaried presidency of an imperial university, giving as his reason: "I want to translate the Bible and to preach the gospel and to train up Christian ministers." An old man in Syria rode horseback eight hours in a wintry storm to administer the communion in a mountain village. Another in Siam pushed his little boat up lonely rivers swarming with crocodiles, and tramped through snake and tiger-infested jungles, that he might preach Christ. Still another in Laos forgot his threescore and ten years and made a solitary six months' journey that he might take to distant peoples the tidings of the gospel. Twenty-six days he was drenched with dew and rain, ten times he had to swim his pony across rivers, four days he wearily tramped because his horse was too jaded to bear him. A young woman in India walks painfully from house to house under a blazing sun, but writes: "This is a delightful work, it is good to be foot-sore in such a cause." Another in Syria stands in a little gallery of a room containing about ten people, besides cows and goats; the mud floor reeking with dampness, the roof dripping tiny waterfalls of rain, the air heavy with smoke, the missionary herself racked with cough and flushed with fever; but tenderly treating two hundred patients a week and writing: "I am very thankful to record God's goodness to me; I do not believe that ever before into one person's life came such opportunities as I enjoy." A physician in Korea cleanses loathsome ulcers, opens the eyes of the blind, and makes the lame to walk. A refined woman in China makes regular visits to a leper colony and ministers lovingly to repulsive sufferers with sightless eyes and rotting limbs.

Pathetic Scenes

And then the scene changes and a sick husband in Turkey asks that the photograph of his wife and children may be hung close to his bed, that he might gaze with inexpressible yearning into the faces of far-off dear ones whom he never expects to see again in the flesh. Alfred Marling, seventy miles from a physician, dies in the furnace of African fever, singing:

"How sweet the name of Jesus sounds!"

A mother in a Syrian shed lines a rude box, places in it the still form of her child, sends it away for distant burial; and then goes back to her sick husband and tries to keep up a brave face and not let him know that her heart is breaking. There are little groups of moving people—husbands following to far-off cemeteries the hallowed dust of their wives, widows walking behind the coffins of their husbands, Rachel mothers weeping for their children and “refusing to be comforted because they were not.” “Six weeks after my arrival in China,” a missionary writes, “my wife, though but shortly before in America adjudged physically sound, died after only a week’s illness. The memories of the cold, bleak, January morning when we laid her in that lonely grave upon the hillside will not soon fade from my mind. What a mournful little procession it was that passed through the streets of hostile Tsi-nan fu that day! With but half a dozen of my new-found friends, I followed the plain coffin borne by coolies, whose jargon seemed all the more unsympathetic because I did not understand it. Oh! the unspeakable desolation that sweeps over a little community such as many of our mission stations are, when death invades its feeble ranks. And then there must be borne the stifled wail reëchoing from America three months later!”

Who can think unmoved of that missionary widow, who, when her husband died at an interior station of Siam, and there was no place nearer than Bangkok where the body could be buried, caused the coffin to be placed in a native boat, leaving a space of eighteen inches

A Stricken Widow
in Siam

wide and eight feet long on each side. She sat on one side and a friend on the other, and the native boatmen pushed the craft out upon the river. That was eight o'clock Friday morning. All day they journeyed under the blazing tropical sun, and the reader can imagine what that meant both to the living and the dead. When darkness fell, the stars surely looked down in pity upon that stricken widow crouching so close to the dead body of her husband that she could not avoid touching his coffin. It was not until two o'clock Saturday afternoon that the pitiful ride ended at Bangkok. Flesh and blood could not have borne such a strain, if God had not heard the dying petition of the husband, who, foreseeing the coming sorrow, had brokenly prayed: "Lord, help her!"

Honor to the Dead at Home

All along the missionary picket-line are the graves of the fallen. Since, two generations ago, Dr. Lowrie buried his wife in India, and Mrs. Reed saw her husband's body weighted with shot and lowered into the ocean, hundreds have laid down their lives. When the soldiers of our country die in a foreign land, a grateful nation brings their bodies home at public expense. After the Spanish-American war, a funeral ship entered New York harbor, amid the booming of minute guns from forts and ships. Two days later, public buildings were closed and ensigns were hung at half-mast, while the honored dust was borne through the nation's capital to historic Arlington. A vast multitude thronged the beautiful city of the dead. As the flag-draped coffins appeared, a ghostly voice seemed to say to the silent host: "Hats off, gentlemen! for yonder come the riderless steeds, the reversed arms, the muffled drums. Something is here for tears." The President, admirals, generals, statesmen, diplomats, bared their heads. The weird music of "The Dead March" melted into the sweeter strains of "Nearer, my God, to Thee." The parting volleys were fired. Clearly and solemnly the bugler sounded taps, and the multitude turned away with tear-dimmed eyes to talk of a noble monument to commemorate the lives of heroes.

But the dead soldiers of the cross lie where they fell on our lonely missionary outposts—amid the jungles of Africa, in the swamps of Siam, beside the rivers of China, and under the palm-trees of India. If we may adapt the words of Mary H. Kingsley to a class that she did not have in mind: "I trust that those at home will give all honor to the men still working in Africa, or rotting in the weed-grown, snake-infested cemeteries and the forest swamps—men whose battles have been fought out on lonely beaches far away from home and

Lonely Missionary Graves

friends and often from another white man's help, sometimes with savages, but more often with a more deadly foe, with none of the anodyne to death and danger given by the companionship of hundreds of fellow soldiers in a fight with a foe you can see, but with a foe you can see only incarnate in the dreams of your delirium, which runs as a poison in burning veins and aching brain—the dread West Coast fever.”

Debt to the Workers

Edward Everett Hale's poem, "All Souls," eloquently voices the debt which succeeding generations owe to the courage and fidelity of the forgotten missionary as well as to the pioneer settler:

“What was his name? I do not know his name:
I only know he heard God's voice and came,
Brought all he loved across the sea,
To live and work for God—and me;
Felled the ungracious oak,
Dragged from the soil
With torrid toil
Thrice gnarled roots and stubborn rock,
With plenty piled the haggard mountainside,
And at the end, without memorial, died;
No blaring trumpet sounded out his fame;
He lived, he died; I do not know his name.

“No form of bronze and no memorial stones
Show me the place where lie his moldering bones.
Only a cheerful city stands,
Built by his hardened hands;

Only ten thousand homes,
Where every day
The cheerful play
Of love and hope and courage comes.
These are his monument and these alone;
There is no form of bronze and no memorial stone."

QUESTIONS ON CHAPTER VIII

AIM: TO APPRECIATE THAT SPIRIT WHICH ALONE IS SUFFICIENT FOR THE MISSIONARY IN HIS SURROUNDINGS

1. In what ways is the life of the ordinary missionary similar to that of minister, physician, or teacher at home?
2. Mention a number of ways in which obstacles that confronted the earlier missionaries have been removed.
3. Name the three principal physical discomforts of the average missionary in the tropics.
4. Mention the same of the average missionary in the temperate zone.
5. What difference in this respect is there between those working in civilized and uncivilized regions?
6. Name all the classes of persons with whom you have helpful social intercourse.
7. What are the principal things that render this intercourse pleasant and helpful?
8. To what extent are you conscious of common sympathies with your fellow citizens?
9. How do your privileges in this respect compare with those of the average missionary?

242 Why and How of Foreign Missions

10. Which of his social deprivations would be hardest for you?
11. How does the average missionary compare with the average minister at home in opportunities for intellectual stimulus?
12. What are the things from which you derive most spiritual inspiration and help?
13. How much of these are available for the missionary at a small station?
14. Try to estimate what you owe to the silent influence of earnest men in your community.
15. Try to estimate what you owe to public opinion.
16. What effect would it have upon you to be constantly surrounded by distress which you were unable to relieve?
17. Why would you hesitate to have a brother of yours live in a community that was lacking in high moral ideals?
18. Try to estimate the moral strain upon those living in heathen communities without a missionary purpose.
19. What do you think would be the effect on yourself of having to preach for months or years at a time without results?
20. How, in your opinion, would the average critic of missionary work succeed in overcoming these obstacles?
21. Was Christ ignorant of the difficulty of the task when he ordered his disciples to teach all nations?

22. If you were starting as a missionary, what resolves would you make as to your personal spiritual life?
23. What resolves would you make as to your attitude toward your fellow missionaries?
24. What, as to your attitude toward the native Christians?
25. What, as to your attitude toward the non-christian natives?
26. To what extent would these resolves be useful for Christians at home?
27. Name the principal things that bring spiritual stimulus to the missionaries on the field.
28. What are the principal things that you would include in a full definition of the missionary spirit?
29. What is the reward to those who overcome all these obstacles?

THE HOME CHURCH AND THE ENTERPRISE

I don't know anything that will commit the Church of Christ more completely to the devotional life, that will take it more often to the throne of God, that will give it more permanently and consistently a sense of the indwelling of the Spirit of Christ, than this habitual confronting of the Church's task in the world.

—William Douglas Mackenzie

When we once see that systematic benevolence is the most wide-reaching embodiment of spiritual energy and the most Godlike expression of it, we conclude that our next business as an organization is to cultivate systematic benevolence. Ours is an educational movement. The great test and sign of advancing culture is systematic instead of spasmodic expression of the soul.

—L. Call Barnes

Not alone are the workers to come and be equipped by prayer; it is only by prayer that we shall call forth the great energies by which the world is to be evangelized. I believe as earnestly as any man in sending out adequate numbers of missionaries from America, but it is not by these men and women that the world is to be evangelized. If we lay on these men and women the whole work of evangelizing the world, the product will not be worth the outlay. . . . And only by prayer will great leaders be raised up in the native Churches, and it is for these leaders that we are waiting now in the missionary enterprise. As far as the native Churches have had such leaders, during the century that is gone, they had them as men of prayer who were supported by prayer.

—Robert E. Speer

IX
THE HOME CHURCH AND THE
ENTERPRISE

WE have considered the phases of the foreign missionary enterprise which are most important from the view-point of the home Christian. We have seen that the motives for the prosecution of the work are those which form a necessary part of true Christian character, and that they make their claim upon every true follower of Christ. We have noted that a vital part of the aim of foreign missions is to place every land where it can do its own home mission work, on a basis which was reached by the nations of Christendom centuries ago. The work of foreign missions will be done in China long before China is Christianized as far as America. We merely wish to make it possible for China to Christianize herself.

Phases Already Considered

We have studied the administration of the boards, and found that they observe every reasonable precaution in securing such economy as is consistent with efficiency, both as to office expenses and as to the support of missionaries on the field. The money contributed

What is Their Meaning to Us?

by the Church is being conscientiously used. We have explained the qualifications required in candidates and the care with which they are selected. Then we have seen the missionary at work among the distinctive conditions that confront him. We have observed the problems involved in the establishment of a self-propagating, self-supporting, self-governing native Church—the goal of missionary endeavor. We have examined the criticisms of missionaries which are more or less current, and found them to be for the most part products either of misunderstanding or of antichristian prejudice. Finally, we have shown something of the spirit of the missionary, a spirit which we are under equal obligation to exhibit. And now the question arises: What concern have we in all these things?

The Measure of Obligation

The foreign missionary enterprise is not the exclusive business of the workers on the field, nor of the boards at home, nor does it rest solely upon rectors or members of local missionary societies. It rests upon every individual Christian. The responsibilities and privileges of the Christian life are inseparable, and no one who repudiates the former has any right to claim the latter. If our nation were engaged in a righteous war, and there came a special call for troops, those best qualified to go would feel the obligation to respond, while enormous appropriations of funds would be ungrudgingly made. If the first supply of troops proved inadequate, if our armies were defeated and the national treasury exhausted, it is safe to say that many would offer their services who were not well fitted to go and could ill be spared at home, while great financial sacrifices would be freely made by all classes of citizens in furnishing the necessary funds. Only the need would measure the supply. We feel that, whatever the cost, our flag must be supported when it goes forth to war. In like manner, the need of the foreign missionary campaign ordered by Christ is the measure of the obligation of the Church. By a claim even higher than that of patriotism, we have a right to expect that the needs will be met.

What are the needs? In the first place, the force on the field must be greatly increased. Making all due allowance for the duty of the growing native churches, we ought to have at least one man missionary for every 50,000 of the 1,000,000,000 people of the non-christian world, besides a proportionate number of women workers. The present force consists of only 8,537 men, clerical and lay, and this number includes the sick, the aged, recruits learning the language, and the considerable number always absent on furlough. It is safe to say that the effective force of men does not exceed 7,000, or one for every 142,857 of the population. This means that the average board would need to multiply its force nearly three times in order to provide one man for every 50,000 people living in non-christian countries.

Larger Force Needed

Enlarged Giving Required

To support this increase, the present rate of giving must be proportionately enlarged. Each man represents an annual cost of approximately $2,000, this sum covering not only his support and that of his family, but his outfit, traveling expenses, and the additional work which he calls into existence. Thus, 14,000 more men would involve an increased expenditure of $28,000,000 a year, and this would take no account of the property that would be required for the residences, colleges, boarding-schools, theological seminaries, hospitals, and printing-presses which would have to be provided and equipped.

A Possible Goal

If volunteers and funds are to be provided on an adequate scale, the home Church must be kept informed and aroused to the need. What we lack is not ability, but interest. A thoroughly awakened Church could accomplish a large part of the aim of foreign missions in a generation. If all congregations and individuals would do in proportion to their ability what some congregations and individuals are already doing, some of us might live to see the successful termination of the foreign missionary enterprise; that is, each land, not indeed completely Christianized, but equipped with a native Church able to handle its own problems. The key to the present situation, therefore, is found ultimately in the interest of the home Church. Interest depends on the right sort of knowledge. Our first need is for a campaign of education.

The three main agencies of education are the home, the school, and the church. It has come about that the first-named does very little that is systematic, and that the two latter have divided the field, one taking secular and the other religious instruction. Whatever the shortcomings of the school, it is at least attacking its problems in earnest. It does its work on a vast scale and expects taxpayers to furnish it with adequate equipment. It claims all the children of school-going age for twenty to thirty hours each week, and provides trained and salaried teachers for their instruction. If there is one thing to which the American people are thoroughly committed, it is secular education, and they view these efforts and meet these demands with supreme satisfaction.

When we turn to religious education, we find that much less is being done. The

The Secular
School

Weaknesses in Religious Education

Sunday-school is a regular institution in every section of the country, and an immense army of scholars assembles every week. Millions of quarterlies and other lesson helps are printed annually, and county, state, and national organizations hold numerous conventions to discuss problems and arouse enthusiasm. We have great cause for gratitude to God for all that has been accomplished in the religious instruction of our children and young people; but in comparison with secular education we must admit that there are three conspicuous weaknesses in the system.

Insufficient Time

1. Religious education receives only a fraction of the time that the secular school obtains, the period available for class work being only one fortieth as long. If we consider education as the handing down of a body of information, the secular school has certainly more to communicate, especially in these latter days. But if the main purpose of education is to help us to be and do, rather than merely to know, the relative importance of the religious side of education is greatly increased. In any event, half or three quarters of an hour once a week does not afford sufficient time.

Teachers Relatively Untrained

2. Teachers receive far less training for religious than for secular work. Small as are the salaries of the teachers in public schools, they are not paid over to those altogether without qualification. On the other hand, while the body of Sunday-school teachers includes some of the most able and cultured people in the country, it also includes many who could never pass the public school test. In some localities, teachers are in such demand that any one willing to take a class is pressed into service, and no questions are asked.

3. The curriculum of the Sunday-school is yet very meager. This is almost a necessary consequence of the two other weaknesses. There is time for only one thing, which of course is the Bible, and owing to the general lack of trained teachers even this is too often not presented in any richness of content. All other subjects are virtually excluded.

Too Meager a Curriculum

From the missionary view-point, these weaknesses are most grievous. They mean that millions of children pass through our Sunday-schools without any adequate instruction on the greatest task of the Christian Church, that millions of our young people and adults are to-day without any more consecutive ideas on the subject than they may have picked up in merely occasional missionary sermons, or in the too fugitive treatment of missionary meetings. How shall we reach these persons with clear, connected, and inspiring missionary instruction?

Remedy for These Weaknesses

Service of Mission Study Class

The mission study class has been found a great help in the solution of this difficult problem. It avoids the time difficulty by holding separate sessions for short weekly courses, at hours that prove most convenient to the small groups composing them. It is gradually supplying a body of persons who know something about missions and are able to teach others. It will probably be for some time to come the best way of reaching young people and adults with systematic missionary instruction. By filling its members with knowledge and enthusiasm it will help to make it practicable to introduce an effective study of missions into the Sunday-school. Sunday-school teachers of every church should be strongly urged to enter a mission study class each year to get a vision of some field or phase of the missionary enterprise. Even under present conditions, they will then have plenty of opportunity to develop missionary spirit in their scholars. Without such a vision, there is no likelihood that they will accomplish anything under any conditions, however favorable.

Training of Leaders

We must spread systematic mission study among all classes in the church, and especially seek to bring under its influence those who appear likely to become future leaders. If the study and discussion of the facts presented in this book have helped you, you owe it to the church to share what you have received with others by trying to enroll them as members of new classes. You may feel ill-qualified to lead such a class, but the subject, rather than your ability in presenting it, may arouse those who will render to the cause a greater service than is ever permitted to you. A series of summer conferences and winter institutes are held every year for the express purpose of training leaders in more effective methods of work, and are suggestive and inspiring.

The systematic study of missions which has arisen in the past few years is one of the most promising signs of the times. It should be pushed until no congregation is without one or more study classes for the training of its Sunday-school teachers and the inspiration of its workers. After the way in which we have neglected this subject in the past, we owe it a generous apportionment of time and pains. A strong study class should prove a power-house for all sorts of missionary effort in the church. It should lead to instructive and enthusiastic missionary meetings, to campaigns of missionary reading, to the introduction of missionary exercises and supplementary instruction in the Sunday-school, to the formation of mission bands, and to increased prayer and giving and service on the part of all the church.

Present Claims of This Propaganda

Average Annual Gift

When it comes to giving, we must face the fact that the church members' average annual gift for foreign missions is less than one dollar per capita. Only about half of the membership of the average church participates in the gifts for missions, and many rectors make no adequate effort to reach the other half. A committee of one denomination reported, a few years ago, that nine tenths of the contributions were made by one tenth of the membership. Some whole churches give nothing at all, and others give only through the women's societies, the pastor and all his officers standing helplessly or indifferently aloof. The plea that they are small and weak reminds one of some little home missionary churches, mere handfuls of poor people, who send offerings for every one of the boards of the Church. A feeble congregation is made stronger by doing what it can. The individual Christian needs to be educated as to his relation to the world-wide mission of the Son of God and to give proportionately and prayerfully towards it, whether he is rich or poor, in a small church or a large one.

The Antiochian Church

If ever a congregation had reason to assign local burdens as an excuse for neglecting foreign missions, it was the little church at Antioch when the Holy Ghost said: "Separate me Barnabas and Saul for the work whereunto I have called them." It was the only church in a large and wicked city. No church in all Europe or America has a greater work at home, in proportion to its resources. The devoted little band, however, never flinched; but "when they had fasted and prayed and laid their hands on them, they sent them away." Why should not the modern Church, with its vastly greater strength, equal the faith and courage of the church at Antioch?

No sympathy should be wasted over the common excuse that people do not have the money that is required. They have it in abundance, and they prove it by spending it freely on things that minister to their pleasure. If some have too many other burdens, they should diminish them. The evangelization of the world is too important an enterprise to take what is left after everything else has been provided for. Many commercial enterprises employ more men and expend more money than the Church would need for the evangelization of the world. Business men do not hesitate to attempt the most colossal things in secular affairs. Not content with the trade of America, they are competing with other nations for the trade of the world. The foreign commerce of the United States now runs up to billions of dollars a year. On every side, we hear of big buildings, big ships, big

A Common Excuse—The Business Contrast

factories, big steel plants, which cost immense sums.

A Sensible
Standard

Why then should it be deemed fanciful for the Church to attempt to raise for the evangelization of the world a sum which many of its members would not regard as impracticable for a secular enterprise? Shall we work for our own enrichment on a vast scale and work for God and our fellow men on a small one? Surely the Church is able to do this thing. I grant that not all the wealth of which we hear so much is tributary to foreign missions, that many Church members are in moderate circumstances and that some of them are poor. I remember, too, that there is Christian work at home which must be supported. The fact remains, however, that intelligent, prayerful, systematic, proportionate giving on the part of poor and rich alike would provide ample funds, without injustice to any family or home obligations. There are thousands of Christians who do not hesitate to incur personal expenditures for a hundred times the amount that they give to foreign missions.

Moravian
Example

The Moravian Church sets an excellent example to Christendom as to what can be done when Christians have the right ideas. Most of its members are poor, but it supports one missionary for every sixty of its membership; whereas among Baptists, Congregationalists, Methodists, and Presbyterians, with far greater wealth, it takes an average of 6,146 members to support one missionary. Allowing for the aid that Moravian missions receive from the members of other Churches, the fact remains that, if all Protestant Churches would send out missionaries in the same proportion as the Moravians, there would be half a million missionaries on the field, a number far in excess of the number that it would be wise to send.

We need not go into questions of method of raising money. Effective ways of doing a thing will be easily found by one who is determined to do it. The boards will gladly send detailed information to all who ask for it. The important thing is to have a method, and to work it in such a way as to secure some offering from every individual, not necessarily large in amount, but proportionate to ability, and to reach the absentees as well as those who are present.

We protest, however, against "the two-cent-a-week" plea. It does not secure the gift of the poor, it benumbs the liberality of the rich, and it belittles the whole enterprise. Fancy a minister standing before a congregation, whose typical member is wearing $50 worth of clothing and $25 worth of jewelry, whose household furniture has cost several thousand

Having a Method

A Belittling Scale

dollars, who smokes from ten to fifty cents' worth of tobacco a day, and who commands not only the conveniences, but many of the luxuries of life—fancy telling such a man that his foreign missionary responsibilities are met by a gift of two cents a week! He spends more than that for blacking his shoes. A proportionate gift for the average layman is not pennies at all, nor even silver, but bills or checks.

Broader Spirit in Gifts

We insist, too, that missionary operations have gone about as far as they can go in dependence upon the passing-the-hat method among those who happen to be present at a given service. Inquiry in a certain State developed the fact that only forty per cent. of the reported membership attended church on a Sunday morning of average weather conditions. Business men who are present seldom carry much cash on their persons. Large givers never have proportionate sums with them. If, in response to an appeal, they empty their pockets, they are doing all they can do, or, at any rate, all they will do under that system. This is an era of large private gifts. Almost every week we hear of some one bestowing $100,000 or $1,000,000 on a college or library or hospital. The chief dependence of our educational and charitable institutions is upon contributions of this character. Is it not almost farcical for the Church to endeavor to maintain churches, hospitals, schools, colleges, theological seminaries, printing-presses, and a host of missionaries and native helpers, by plate collections as an annual incident of public service? If we are to give the gospel to the world we must raise money for missions as we raise it for other big enterprises, by subscription. The wisest pastors are calling for pledges instead of cash. A man who would unblushingly slip a quarter into a collection basket would never dream of signing a card for such a sum. We have passed the canal-boat and stage-coach days in foreign missions as well as in transportation. We must now have money in larger sums. Our laymen are doing big things in business. Why should they not do big things for God?

Each church should have a committee of laymen to coöperate with the rector in promoting foreign missionary interest and increasing foreign missionary gifts in the congregation. This committee should do among the men of the church what the woman's society does so well among the women. Experience has shown that the men will make prompt response, if intelligent and systematic effort is put forth to reach them.

Whenever an effort is made to increase gifts for foreign missions, there are some who raise

Committee of Laymen

Right Balance Between Home and Foreign

a hue and cry about the alleged diversion of funds from home enterprises. A Presbytery not long ago refused to permit a missionary campaign within its bounds, on the ground that it would interfere with gifts for other causes. Yet official reports showed that this Presbytery was giving nearly ten times as much to home objects as to foreign. There is a great work to be done in the homeland, but it is not helped in the least by opposition to foreign missions. Giving to world evangelization enlarges the mind, broadens the sympathies, and so opens the springs of benevolence that those who do most for foreign missions are usually the very ones who do most for home missions. Mr. Jacob A. Riis, who has toiled so indefatigably for the poor people of New York City, says that "for every dollar you give away to convert the heathen abroad, God gives you ten dollars' worth of purpose to deal with your heathen at home." "A religion," adds Dr. Clarke, "cannot be really strengthened at home by declining to extend its blessings abroad. It is a complete misunderstanding of Christianity to suppose that some Christian Church or country, by concentrating its attention and labors upon itself, can so accumulate power as to be able to turn in full vigor to do its Christian work for others at some later date. It was said long ago that Christianity is a commodity of which the more we export the more we have at home. It is equally true that the less we export the less we may find at home."

The rector has the chief responsibility in this effort to arouse the Church. But not all pastors are meeting their obligations in this matter, and even the most zealous pastor can accomplish little without the support of his members. The first advance move may need to come from some one in the congregation. The work must be done whether the pastor is willing to occupy his rightful place of leadership or not.

Responsibility of Rector

Appeals should not be based solely on financial necessities. The cause is cheapened by too much begging and pleading. The fact that an enterprise wants money is not a sufficient reason why it should receive it, nor is the begging argument apt to secure anything more than the beggar's temporary dole. Do not apologize or talk about "the needs of the board." As the late President Harrison pithily said: "The man whose grocery bills are unpaid might just as well talk about the needs of his butler. Present your need, the needs of the Church, the needs of the world, those claims which Church membership implies and which are more than life in that personal relation with the great Head of the Church."

Appeal to High Considerations

If hearers complain: "Missions, missions, always missions"; reply in the notable words of Bishop Doane of Albany: "Yes, always missions, because they are the life-blood, the heart-beat, the lungs-breath of the body of Jesus Christ."

Personal Devotion with Sound Judgment

There are many persons who can contribute but little money to the missionary cause, who are able to render service of positive value by devoting their energies to stimulating interest in the Church. Work of this kind may count for more in the end than large gifts that are now being received. Two things should be kept in mind to this end. First, the service should be offered in the same spirit of sacrifice which we expect our missionaries on the field to manifest. The worker should not be discouraged if the obstacles are at first very great, but should work and pray the way through to success. In the second place, great care must be taken to avoid alienating people by tactless behavior. We often see persons of undoubted zeal and consecration who make the cause they espouse a byword in the community on account of the methods they employ to advertise it. It would be a good thing if we could see ourselves more frequently as others see us; the nearest approach to this is the candid advice of friends who have sound judgment.

We must keep prominent before the Church the call to life-service on the field. There are so many who are not free to go or who are not fit to go, that the burden of proof rests heavily upon those who have the qualifications to show that they are exempt. Numbers of young men and women who have no obligation that would prevent them from accepting a lucrative business position in a foreign land and whom the boards would be glad to appoint drift into other lines of work every year, largely because the claims of foreign missionary service have never been personally brought to their attention. If any of us would feel gratified at having obtained for some young friend the opportunity to earn a good salary, we should feel that we had conferred a much greater favor by enabling him to have a personal share in the spread of the kingdom of God abroad. If the end of life is use and not gain, we should seek positions of the greatest usefulness both for ourselves and for others.

Studying, giving, and preaching, however, will be of little avail unless praying accompanies and pervades them. The foreign missionary enterprise is essentially spiritual in character, and the prayers of the home Church are a real asset in conducting it. Therefore, "Pray without ceasing."

Not Excusing
the Chosen Ones

Developing a Praying Church

Daily and World-wide Remembrance

It is sadly true, however, that many professing Christians never pray for the missionary enterprise from one year's end to the other, except unconsciously as they utter the Lord's prayer. What excuse can they give? Either disbelief in the power of prayer or sheer ignorance and lack of interest would seem to be the only possible answers. The latter may be your fault or mine. There is greatly needed some systematic effort to develop a praying Church. Foreign missions should have a stated place in the private and family prayer of every Christian. It already has such a place in thousands of homes. Many of the boards publish year-books in which missionaries' names and some phase of their work appear in connection with each day of the year. Such daily remembrance, especially if supplemented by information to be found in the yearly report of the board and the missionary magazines of the Church, will in time give one a sympathetic knowledge of the whole field and bring no small cheer to the lonely workers far away. Englishmen exulted in the fact that, at a given hour on the day of Queen Victoria's Jubilee, June 20, 1897, "God save the Queen" was sung in all the churches and on all the ships of the British empire, so that with the progress of the sun, jubilant voices upraised the national anthem westward over oceans and continents until the mighty chorus rolled around the world. In like manner, if Christians in the homeland were to lift their voices in prayer for missions every morning, the entire globe would be belted daily with never-ending petitions to God.

Such praying constitutes a more vital element in missionary success than is commonly supposed. The faith of the four friends who brought the palsied man to Christ was one of the essential factors in the miracle of grace that followed. "And Jesus seeing their faith, saith unto the sick of the palsy, Son, thy sins are forgiven." The very largeness of the enterprise summons us to a mighty confidence in God. Foreign missions is the greatest task in the world, but we are not conducting it alone. It was laid upon us by him who declared that "all authority" was given unto him and that he would be with his disciples "always." He is strong in power and infinite in resources, "able to save," and he calls us to be co-workers with him. Enthusiasm and determination in our response will spell victory abroad.

The Church may well consider the relation of spiritual power to missionary zeal. It is a fundamental law of the kingdom that power is given to be used for others. Talents must not be hid in napkins and buried.

Spiritual Enthusiasm at Home Spells Victory Abroad

Power Given for Use

The Holy Spirit Produced the Early Witnesses

The New Testament makes this very clear. The Holy Spirit was given in order that the disciples might become witnesses.<sup>1</sup> Before Pentecost, they had no interest in world evangelization; but when the Holy Spirit came upon them, they became evangelists to a man. The remainder of the Book of Acts is a wonderful record of evangelistic spirit and extension. The early Church was preeminently a missionary Church and its members proclaimed the gospel in almost every part of the then known world.

Deepening of Spiritual Life Attended by Missionary Advance

It would be interesting to cite in detail the illustrations incarnated in Ulfilas, Columba, Raymund Lull, and Von Welz. Significant also from this view-point is the rise of Pietism with its luminous names of Francke and Spener, Ziegenbalg and Schwartz. Zinzendorf and Moravianism, Wesley and Methodism, have their place in such a study, for without them we could hardly understand the new era of missions which began with Carey. In America, the work of Brainerd and Edwards was directly related to a new baptism of the Holy Spirit. It was not an accident that several of the missionary organizations of the nineteenth century were born during the great revivals of the first two decades, or a mere coincidence that the forward movement in missions that characterized the closing years of that century dated from the extraordinary revivals of 1875-6. The teaching of history on this subject is unbroken. Every deepening of the spiritual life has been followed by a new effort to give the gospel to the world; but there is no record anywhere of the Holy Spirit's power remaining with any Church which did not use it in witnessing for Christ.

<sup>1</sup> John xv. 26, 27; xvi, 7, 8; Acts i. 8.

Here is one cause of the poverty of spiritual life. The Church is living too much for itself. God has already given it enough power to evangelize Europe and America half a dozen times over. Is it reasonable to suppose that he will increase that power simply for this purpose? This suggests the remedy both for a low spiritual vitality at home and the comparative failure to support the missionary enterprise on an adequate scale. The Church must be spiritually quickened. Foreign missions is primarily a spiritual movement and only spiritual people will adequately maintain it. Dr. Arthur Mitchell was wont to say: "The cause of foreign missions goes down to the roots of the spiritual life, and we need look for no abundance of fruit until that life is enriched." When Henry Martyn, as he lay burning with fever in Persia, received a letter asking how the missionary interest of

The Church
Must Live More
With Christ

the Church at home could be increased, the dying saint replied: "Tell them to live more with Christ; to catch more of his spirit; for the spirit of Christ is the spirit of missions, and the nearer we get to him the more intensely missionary we must become."

To-Day's Imperative Summons

Never before has the summons been so imperative as it is to-day. Practically the whole non-christian world is now accessible. Men in other spheres are recognizing the opportunity. Governments are pressing into the open doors and straining every nerve to influence these awakening nations. Business firms in Europe and America are keenly alive to the situation and are sending their agents to the remotest parts of the earth. The Greek and Roman Catholic Churches are pouring priests and brothers, monks and nuns, into heathen lands and spending vast sums in equipping them with churches and schools. The Mohammedians are flooding Africa with zealous missionaries. We should show equal loyalty and redouble our efforts, that we may mold these new conditions before hostile influences become established. It is not a rhetorical figure, but the sober truth that it would take treble the sum that the Churches are now giving to handle the situation in an adequate way. We must apply business common sense to our missionary undertakings.

Each Church should immediately consider its distinct missionary responsibility and effectively plan to meet it. Many Churches are already doing this, and the others should follow their example. There is no valid reason why every city and village on the planet should not hear the gospel within the next fifty years, and have, too, a native Church so far developed that it could assume the chief duty of completing the work. This is the tremendous question of the day: Will the Church rise to the opportunity which confronts her? The cause of Christ is straitened, not by the Holy Spirit, not by the heathen, but only by ourselves. We believe, with Father Hecker, that "a body of free men, who love God with all their might, and yet know how to cling together, could conquer this modern world of ours." "We can do it if we will."

"We Can Do It if We Will"

We are not prophets, but as we face the future, may we not see a vision, not the baseless dream of the enthusiast, but the reasonable expectation of those who believe that the divine Hand guides the destinies of men? This vision is that the movement for the evangelization of the world will grow to more and more majestic proportions until all men shall know the Lord. Reports from widely separated fields amply justify this vision. Every mail is burdened with them. Apart

Vision of a Crowning Movement

from the rapidly increasing number of converts, there are unmistakable signs that a great movement has begun. The very fact that heathen systems are passing from indifference to hostility and feel obliged to conceal their coarser practises and to emphasize their better features is a tribute to the growing power of Christianity. Society in Asia is becoming more ashamed of open vice. Standards of conduct are growing purer. The character of Christ is universally conceded to be the loftiest in history. What Benjamin Kidd calls the altruistic ideas of Christianity have been liberated in non-christian nations and they are slowly but surely transforming them. The traveler in those vast continents becomes conscious of the working of mighty forces that are creating conditions more favorable to the rapid triumph of the gospel. He is impressed, not so much by the actual number of those already converted, as by the strength of the current which is sweeping majestically toward the goals of God. He feels, with Gibson, that the situation is satisfactory; not that we are contented with ourselves or with our work, but that "a crucial experiment has been made. We know what can be done and can predict results." We see that we are in the trend of the divine purpose and that "his day is marching on."

"May the constraining memories of the cross of Christ and that great love wherewith he loved us be so in us that we may pass that love on to those who are perishing. May he touch all our hearts with the spirit of self-sacrifice and with the inspiration of that love of his which, when he came to redeem the world, kept nothing back!"<sup>1</sup>

Petition for a Love Keeping
Nothing Back

QUESTIONS ON CHAPTER IX

AIM: TO REALIZE THE PERSONAL RESPONSIBILITY OF OURSELVES AND OTHER CHRISTIANS AT HOME

1. Summarize as strikingly as possible a single conclusion you have reached from each of the preceding chapters.
2. In view of the need of the work, state what you consider to be the duty of the average Christian.
3. Compare the cost of the foreign missionary enterprise in men and money with that of the American navy.
4. Which is worse, a citizen who dodges his taxes, or a Christian who dodges his foreign missionary obligation? Give reasons for your view.
5. What proportion of the 20,000,000 members of evangelical Churches in the United States would need to go abroad to supply the need for men?

---

<sup>1</sup> Mrs. Isabella Bird Bishop.

274 Why and How of Foreign Missions

6. What would be the weekly assessment on each Church member to raise the additional funds needed?
7. How does the fact that so many are ignorant or indifferent affect the responsibility of those who know something about foreign missions and are interested in it?
8. What place ought a subject so important as foreign missions to have in the education of every Christian?
9. How does it seem to you to compare in importance with ancient history?
10. How can we secure more time for religious education?
11. How can we secure teachers with better training?
12. Arrange the subjects that should be included in the curriculum of religious education in the order of their importance.
13. What are the principal advantages of the mission study class as an educational agency?
14. What special responsibility do you think rests upon those who have been members of a mission study class?
15. Write out what you think might be done in organizing mission study classes in your own congregation.
16. What do you consider the principal reason why comparatively so little money is given to foreign missions?

17. What plans do you think would be most effective in increasing the amount given by your own congregation?
18. What are the principal motives that should be urged in making an appeal for money for foreign missions?
19. Mention several ways in which a home Christian of limited means might aid the missionary enterprise.
20. What missionary organization ought each local congregation to have?
21. What systematic methods should the local congregation adopt to raise up volunteers for the foreign field?
22. How personal do you think you have a right to become in suggesting foreign missionary service to another?
23. What good excuses can you give for not praying for foreign missions?
24. What methods can you suggest for promoting prayer for foreign missions in a community?
25. What suggestions for subjects of prayer have you gained from this course?
26. In what ways will interest in foreign missions help home missions?
27. Is any other cause so neglected in proportion to its importance as is foreign missions?
28. Sum up the principal needs of the foreign missionary enterprise.
29. Which of these needs in your opinion is being most adequately and which least adequately met?
30. Why are these needs especially urgent just now?

UNIVERSAL
LIBRARY

136 574

UNIVERSAL
LIBRARY